"The author of 'Rab and his Friends' has a place apart among contemporary essaysts. His manner and his matter are alike peculiar to himself. They remind one very charmingly of other times and other ways than our own, and yet of our own as well. They are modern, and yet they are of the old school. They stand hidway between the intense and very careful present and a vigorous and somewhat reckless past, and they are touched with some of the characteristics of both."—Alla, No. 2810.

"We do not shrink from saying that Mr. Brown is the first who has given the world a complete blography of the man... If it adds little to our knowledge of Bunyan himself, it enables us to realize more thoroughly than before the village where he was born; the town where, either us prisoner or free man, he spent the greater part of his life; the congregation of which he was first member and then minister,—an office in which Mr. Brown succeeds him; the people who were his neighbours and associates; the troubled times, full of the throes of intestine strife, eivil and religious, in which he lived."—Sal. Rev., 1xii, 63.

"He has produced the most elaborate and exhaustive account of Bunyan hitherto published, and has, indeed, left no room for a successor. . . . One point Mr. Brown makes, and pietty clearly, that has escaped former blographers,—namely, that Bunyan did not write his principal allegory during his twelve years' imprisonment of six months."—Spectator, iix. 49.

Brown, Oliver Maddox-, 1855-1874, b. at Finch-ley, Eng., son of Ford Maddox-Brown, a distinguished painter, gave promise during his brief life of remarkable excellence both as an artist and an author. Several of his water-colors, painted at the age of fourteen to seventeen, were exhibited in public galleries in London, and some poems written at the same period have been considered still more striking evidence of a precocious genius. His only publication during his lifetime was a story written when he was sixteen, which was included with other productions in a volume published after his death. For biog., see Ingram, J. H., infra. 1. Gabriel Denver, Lon., 1873, 12mo. "Mr. Brown's spelling is like that of Leconte de Lisle, concerning which Théophile Gautier politely remarked that it would be simpler to write in Greek at once. As to Mr. Brown's examination of the character and legend of Circe, we are constrained to say that, with all his industry, he is following a false trail and mythologizing on a mistaken method. Mr. Brown reasons on what he culls 'the natural phenomena theory.' In his opinion (if we do not misunderstand him) the incidents in the Odyssey are mostly veiled statements about processes among the larger atmospheric phenomena, day, night, moonshue, and so forth, and it is his object to interpret the original meaning of the narrative. The apparent inconsistencies in the character of Circe are 'explained fully by the natural phenomena theory and by that alone.' To our minds the 'apparent inconsistencies' are more readily explained by the theory that 'souvent femme varie,' and that there is a great deal of the woman left in the goddess."—Sat. "It is a good deal to say of a county history that it can be read through with pleasure; yet this can certainly be said of Mr. Craig-Brown's pages, which are never deficient in interest. .. In fact, his literary skill is somewhat an impediment to his reader's appreciation of his erudition. This does not imply that the erudition is not there, but it is not the erudition of an antiquary or an archæologist. In fact, Mr. Craig Brown is neither of these, but is rather a social historian. It is the life, the manners and customs—above all, the literature and the character—of the dwellers in Ettrick Forest which attract him."—M. CREIGHTON: Historical Rev., No. 12.

"He has written with all his soul and with all his strength... A consequence of this sincerity is that his verse should gain him friends and admirers wherever it is verse should gain him friends and admirers wherever it is read, and that he should be as well known among strangers as among his own people. . . . It must be noted, however, that the author's romance is never so striking in conception or so successful in execution as his fun, his wit, his tenderness, his pictures of life and character, or his dramatic analysis of emotion. —Ath., No. 2793.

"We cannot say whether the author of this volume has much gift for poetry of the conventional form. But what he has done he has done well,—almost to perfection. He has given us a fragment of living experience, quivering, if we may say so, with reality; he has touched the springs of unexpected laughter, sometimes of unfamiliar tears."—Spectator, liv. 834.

Browning, Robert, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1812–
1889. After his wife's death Mr. Browning resided mainly in London, spending, however, a part of each year on the Continent,—in later years chiefly at Venice, where he died at the Palazzo Rezzonico, Dec. 12. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. In 1881 the Browning Society was formed in London to promote the study of the poet's works, and many similar societies have since been formed in England and the United States. The following list of his works includes those mentioned ante, vol. i., where, among other defects, very few dates are appended. Far more minute information concerning separate poems and volumes will be found in Mr. Furnivall's Bibliography of Browning. 1. Pauline: a Fragment of a Confession, Lon., 1833, p. 8vo. "The length of the poem is far too great; the form of it is clumsy; the repetitions numerous. Here and there is a passage full of Mr. Browning's old contortions and obscurities, which have rendered 'Paracelsus' and so many of his lyrics sealed books to the multitude. But, all deductions being made, he has in the present volumes given to the world a poem that must be considered one of the most considerable of the nineteenth century."—Sat. Rev., xxvii.

"The title of Saviour of Society is almost as definitely personal as a proper name and . . . the French Empire might have been substituted for the imaginary principality.

The Emperor Napoleon indeed would, even if he had been introduced in his own name, have had little reason to complain of an apologist who sometimes defends his conduct and motives with a subtle ingenuity of which he might perhaps himself be scarcely capable. Notwithbe might perhaps himself be scarcely capable. Notwith-standing the ironical appearance of the title-page, his services in saving society are acknowledged in perfect seriousness. . . . The picturesque and impressive passages which are thickly interspersed through the poem would sufficiently atone for defects which it might be possible to point out both in the plan and the composition. . . The intellectual effort which is required to grapple with Mr. Browning's marvellous involutions of thought is in itself no inconsiderable pleasure, for experience shows that the windings of the labyrinth are regulated by a law, and that in the inmost recesses a treasure is concealed."—Sal. 17. Fifine at the Fair, Lon., 1872, 12mo.

"The whole of Mr. Browning's poem is ... an illustration of his text that the life of man is a life of error lived by the help of truth, a life of falschood which implies the need and capacity for reality, a life of illusion grounded and fulfilled in some ultimate perception of true being, a life of endless yearning after that which always eludes and fulfilled in some ultimate perception of true being, a life of endless yearning after that which always eludes and fulfilled or the nymph-goddess by Æschylus when he called her 'divine or mortal, or a mingling of both. This is the theme which Mr. Browning pursues through many a page of his eccentric, caustic, abrupt, business-like passion, into something like a philosophy of love, of beauty, of art, and even of faith."—Spectator, xiv, 853.

"It would need a bold man, indeed, to read the book through once steadily from cover to cover, close it, and declare himself possessed of the key to the riddle. His second reading will soon disabuse him. His third and fourth—each of which will be labour well paid—will make him wonder, with ourselves, whether Mr. Browning has not, in Samsonic wantonness of strength, set the world a riddle to be solved by those alone who plough with his heifer."—Ath., No. 3228.

"Fiftine' is the most enigmatic of all Mr. Browning's works, with the exception of 'Sordello.'... Yet in spite of all the drawbacks to enjoyment which are wilfully interposed, the subtle and profound genius of Mr. Browning encourages and partially rewards apparently hopeless toil. It is his pleasure to follow in the plan of his poem the Gasual associations of a kind of meditative day-dream, until, passing into an actual dream as it is conventionally represented in poetry, he composes one of those symbolic allegories which are unknown to the sl

"Mr. Browning . . . has never chosen a more dramatic, or, it may be added, a more terrible, subject than he has done in the 'linn Album.' In this he has displayed, more than anywhere else, the essentially dramatic power of concentration which he possesses in a marked degree. The force of his new poem, which is appalling in the swift convergence of three histories of tragic passion, is little marred by any wandering into the realms of the speculative reflection that takes a reader's attention away from the characters put before him."—Sat. Rev., xl. 716.

"The raw material of a 'penny dreadful,' such as the theme here is, requires more artistic manipulation than Mr. Browning has given it before it can be called a poem. Beauty of any kind is what he has carefully excluded. Vulgarity, therefore, is stamped upon the 'lin Album,' in spite of the ingenuity with which, by suppressing name and place and superfluous circumstance, the writer succeeds in presenting only the spiritual action and reaction of his characters upon each other, in spite of the marvellous scalpel-exercise of analysis which bares the most recondite motives, in spite of the intellectual brilliancy which gives a value to everything he has to say."—J. "We expected great things from this translation, and we have been bitterly disappointed... He has trampled upon his mother-tongue as with the hoots of a buffalo, and played such fantastic tricks with its syntax, prosody, and played such fantastic tricks with its syntax, prosody, and idlom that it requires all the nobler poems with which he has enriched and adorned the English language to weigh against the deep treason of these unparalleled of fences."—Spectator, 1,1402.

"The two poems which make up the present volume apparently owe their origin to Mr. Browning's residence at one time on the coast of Brittany, and at another time in a remote village on the Savoy side of the Lake of Geneva. . . The reader . . . is destined to endure the history of two deservedly forgotten poets whose existence Mr. Browning has unhapply re-discovered, because they lived respectively at Croisic in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. . . The poem contains nearly fourteen hundred lines, of which not one is calculated to dwell in human memory. . . The poem which takes its name from the hamlet of La Saisiaz is founded on personal experience of the sudden death of a near friend . . . From a touching expression of feelings natural on the occasion, Mr. Browning passes into a long and subtle course of reasoning on the probability of a future life. As in many other poems, he rather indicates than expresses thoughts which have probably in his own unind both a logical and an imaginative sequence. . . No poet would exect Mr. Browning in the faculty of reasoning in verse if he could but condescend to be lucid."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 759.

"The style is less obscure than that of some of Mr. Browning's poems, and his characteristic vigour survives, though it is almost wholly exhibited in a grotesque form, and for the purpose, or at least with the effect, of giving useless pain."—Sat. Rev., xlvii. 774.

"This is by far the best book which Mr. Browning has published for many years. Though not reaching the level of his 'Men and Women,' or of the first portions of 'The Ring and the Book,' it has many passages full of his characteristic power, and, except where a rough style gives dramatic force to the sketch. . . . nothing at all of the truculent ugliness, the ostentatious broken-windedness, of his latest gasping style of English verse. Of course, his subjects are, as usual with Mr. Browning, startling subjects. He not only loves to flash his weird figures upon the imagic lanthorn, but to present you with a subject that takes your breath away as much by the singularity of its attitude as by the suddenness of its appearance. He rejects purposely the shading and the moral atmosphere which make the grimmest subjects seem natural when they are given in connection with all the conditions of their history and origin, for his object is to make you see the wonder of the world, rather than its harmony, or the context which, partly at least, explains it. But assuming . . the poet's special bent and genius, there is nothing specially harsh in this volume, and much that is really powerful, while the harshest pictures in it are lent a touch of grandeur by the purpose which penetrates the life portrayed."—Spectator, life, 692.

General Criticism:—

"No poet since Burns—none, perhaps, since Shakespeare—has known and felt so deeply as Mr. Browning the pathos of human lite."—Ath., No. 2639.

"If Mr. Arnold is the poet of our times who as poet could least resist in matadia du siècle in its subtler forms, he whose energy of heart and soul most absolutely rejects and repels its influence is Mr. Browning. To him the world appears to be a palestra in which we are trained and tested for other lives to come; it is a gymnasium for athletes. Action, passion, knowledge, beauty, science, art,—these are names of some of the means and instruments of our training and education. The vice of vices, according to his ethical creed, is languor of heart, lethargy or faintness of spirit, with the dimness of vision and feebleness of hand attending such moral enervation. Which of us does not suffer now and again from a touch of spiritual paralysis? Mr. Browning's poetry, to describe it in a word, is a galvanic battery for the use of spiritual paralytics. At first the shock and the tingling frightened patients away; now they crowd to the physician and celebrate the cure. Which of us does not need at times that virtue should pass into him from a stronger human soul? To touch the singing robes of the author of 'Rabbi Ben Ezra, and 'Prospice, and 'The Grammarian's Funeral,' is to feel an influx of new strength."—E. Dowden: Victorian Literature. (Transcripts and Studies, p. 210.)

"The essential thing about him, what differences him from other poets, seems to be that he is primarily a psychologist, with certain favorite and obtrusive theories as regards religion, life, and love, and with a subtle and intricate mode of expressing himself—we do not speak of the strained prosaicalness, the labored conversationalism, of his surface style—which is perfectly in consonnance with the depth of his insight into the intricacies and subtleties of human character which he so naturally and so much loves to study and depict."—Nation, viii. 135.

"Browning is by nature and sympathy a realist. He has a strong hold on fact, a resolute a version from fancies and illusiona, however arising, from whatever part of man's nature they spring, by whatever interest encouraged; keen and hardy thought all the energetic curlosity has in it something for something of Aristotle. Science, in the compared and thorough sense, though no 'pursuit of his, is in complete sympathy with the habit and operation of his mind. But with this quality and these powers he is also a thinker, and, above all, a poet. He is, therefore, not mastered by his practical bent nor by the world of facts, and he is certainly not absorbed or over-impressed with the complete sympathy with the habit and operation of his mind. But with this quality and these powers he is also a thinker, and, above all, a poet. He is, therefore, not mastered by his practical bent nor by the world of facts, and he is certainly not absorbed or over-impressed world not satisfy the mind. He knows the this significances of the mind. He knows the this significances that facts have for though and depths. He is, in a wealth and addistration of the complete the complete the property of the same and an addistration of the complete the property of the reality of the ideal, the thinker's conviction of its spirituality. Aware of both sides of experience, and keenly aware of its real side, by cise seen upon this ground of its printiality. Aware of both sides of experience, and keenly aware of its real side, by cise seen its characteristic of man's own nature. Of all world passion; and the world of man's own nature, of all world passion; and the world of man's world of things and forces. The beliefs and emotions, the characters and actions, of men, the expression of man through religion and art, the revelation of man in interact and milkstory—here indeed is a realm of facts of most cu crises which it here to the tree to exect them on their guard, those strange conjunctures which break down barriers, stifle prudence, and sweep away conventionality. Such lightning-flashes light up the very essence of human nature, and reveal the soul to itself. On the other hand, he is, on similar grounds, attracted to strong passionate characters, who alone are capable of the requisite intensity and energy of feeling. It is not the laws of life which he esteems, but the exceptions. . . Even in the introspective drama, which is his own chosen field, he is not in one sense dramatic. He does not merge himself in his characters, but always speaks with his vizor raised. His thought is vividly embodied in real men and women; but the embodiment is often permeated with his own strong personality. He enters into the hearts and minds of his creations, lodges himself there, scrutinizes their experiences, analyzes their motives, and presents them and their case in the light of his own mental habits. On the other hand, no dramatist except Shakespeare has created so vast a variety of human characters, each distinctively individualized, each surrounded by circumstances of his own appropriate world, set in a frame which is drawn with infinite detail and unfailing sympathy. His abstractions are always translated into terms of real life, and his thought is always presented in living characters. Browning himself is repeated; but the vitality of no one creation is impaired; each figure is complete and distinct in itself. The poet is present indeed, but he gives us no models twisted into a fitting pose, through whose mouth he utters his own opinions or appropriate meditations. Here is no simulation of life more ghastly than original death, no play of limb and feature reflected from the individuality of the artist. On the contrary, Browning has produced a varied range of characters, drawn from every scale of humanity, every age and every clime, men and women throbbing with life and passion, intense in the expression of emotions which they intensely feel. It is true that he relegion to the quick apprehensions of his readers, that he requires them to meet him half-way with their energies fully awake, and that his character pieces are presented without aid from actors, stage direction, or action. His scenery is laid in the chambers of thought; his persons are feelings, his situations transitions of emotion, his crises moments in the growth of moods, his catastrophes the moods themselves. The mental vicissitudes which he traces are embodied and individualized, not by the actions which interpret formed characters, but by the impulses which reveal characters in process of formation. But, in spite of these difficulties, he has reanimated dead minds and given them voice to proclaim their inmost secrets, because he has fused his live soul with the mert mass by the sympathetic action of a vivid imagination. And in so doing he has created a new form of dramatic literature, and taken and taken "' for a nobler stage the soul itself,

"for a nobler stage the soul itself,
Its shifting fancies and celestial lights,
With all its grand orchestral silences,
To keep the pauses of the rhythmic sounds,"

"It is an admirable book in many ways, full of the nutriment of fact, and of just observations often eloquently and always lucidly put; but it is too big. . . The subject is vast, the knowledge of the author is immense, in every page those who wish to know America obtain fresh nutriment for their thoughts. . . The exhaustiveness of the book; its wealth of knowledge; its conspicuous and sometimes almost harassing impartiality, are marvels; but still, in this generation, and among the flood of interests which press on every man competent to study such a work, time has to be considered. With that reserve, however, we have nothing but praise for 'The American Commonwealth.' We have not found a point of interest which is not thoroughly discussed, or an opinion which is not supported by full illustrations, or a judgment which is visibly tinetured in the slightest degree either by prejudice or rancour.'—Spectator, Ixi, Isli.

"He is apparently very conscious of the vast importance of America, and, though he does not argue for a side, is a firm believer in the virtues of democracy. Yet he has to write a long book to tell us such truths about it as these,—that, after a century of effort under the most favourable circumstances, it has achieved a government in which mediocrity is preferred, in which personal interests are of immense importance, in which the general vulgarity and rudeness of the scramble shut out men who possess ability and some regard for their dignity."—Sut. Rec., Ixi, 1745.

"It may be safely assumed that all caudid Americans will recognize it as a truthul and trustworthy picture of our institutions and our people. The prevailing sentiment in regard to it in this country will be wonder at its powerful, clear, and sympathetic appreciation of all that is strong and all that is weak in the phase of human progress which is working out upon this continent."—Nation.

Buckle, Henry Thomas, F.R.A.S., [ante, vol. i., add.,] b. at Lee, Eng. Owing to his delicate health when young, he received very little education, but in 1840, after the death of his father, a London ship-owner, he went abroad for a year, and studied the languages of the Continental countries with such avidity and success that in 1850 he could read nineteen languages with facility and converse fluently in seven. He passed most of the remainder of his life in London, engaged chiefly in the preparation of a work which was originally intended to be a general history of civilization. The first volume, which bore the title of History of Civilization in England, vol. i., was published, as stated ante, vol. i., in 1857; vol. ii., which treats of Spain and Scotland, in 1861, (not 1858, as stated ante, vol. i.) The work thus left incomplete, and forming in fact only an introduction, was republished as History of Civilization in England, was republished as history of Civinzation in England, France, Spain, and Scotland, 1866, 3 vols. p. 8vo. There have been six later editions, the last in 1878. Translutions have been published in France, Germany, and Russia, and in the last-mentioned country the work has had an extensive circulation and a stronger influence than elsewhere. Buckle published nothing more, except than elsewhere. Duckie published nothing more vaccous some magazine articles and a pamphlet entitled A Letter to a Gentleman respecting Pooley's Case, 1859. For biog., see Huth, A. H., in/ra. The Miscellaneous and Posthumous Works of Henry Thomas Buckle. Edited, with a Biographical Notice, by Helen Taylor. 1885, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The posthumous works consist of but Mr. Buckle's Commonplace-Books and some hundred and fifty notes or fragments, of various lengths. . . As to what are called the 'Miscellaneous Works,' they consist . . . of but the single lecture and the single magazine article which marked the beginning, and we may also say the close, of Mr. Buckle's public career."—4th., No. 2386.

"There are . . . pleces here which, fragmentary as they are, it was quite right to preserve and publish. But to publish a huge gathering, sometimes of obvious truths, sometimes of obvious blunders, but from books which are in everybody's hands, bits from books which do not deserve to be in anybody's hands, is no real tribute to Mr. Buckle's memory."—Sat. Bulwer, Sir William Henry Lytton Earle,
Baron Dalling and Bulwer, G.C.B., 1801–1872,
[ante, vol. i., where the year of his birth is incorrectly given as 1804, add. : | educated at Harrow and Cambridge; served several years in the army; became a diplomatist, and proceeded through the various grades of attaché, secretary of legation, chargé d'affaires, &c., to that of ambassador to Spain 1843-48, minister plenipotentiary to the United States 1849-52, and to Tuscany 1852-55, and ambassador extraordinary to Turkey 1858-65. He was several times elected to Parliament, and was raised to the peerage in 1871. Add to the books mentioned in vol. i. a small volume of poems, published in 1822, and: 1. work as published in 1876.)
"We could wish the life had been written by one who had lived more in his society, and could to a certain extent have Boswellized him, as he would have repaid the process more perhaps than most of our public men. As it is, the book, though a valuable contribution to history, is upon the whole rather dry, and very unlike what one's imagination had previously conceived of a life of Lord Palmerston."—Acad., vi. 575.

4. (Ed.) Selections from Lord Palmerston's Private Journals of Tours in France in 1815 and 1818, Lon., 1871, 8vo.

"As Sir H. Bulwer's materials for the personal biography "As Sir H. Bulwer's materials for the personal biography of Lord Palmerston were necessarily scanty, he is fortunate in the discovery of a highly interesting fragment of his Journal. It is evident that Lord Palmerston was a quick and accurate observer; and all the extracts which Sir H. Bulwer has selected from his letters and diaries prove that he was an easy and lively writer."—Sal. Rev., xxxl. 246.

"Vigorous, learned, full of audacities and self-assertive-ness, these pages will prove, to those who take an interest in the subject, delightful reading... In muca of his cri-icism of the Revised Version I must confess myself very much at one with him. But if he supposes that he can turn back the course of critical inquiry, and re-establish the hitherto received text—or something much more like it than that of Drs. Westcott and Hort—in place of the conclusions of the most advanced scholarship, he will undoubtedly find that he has undertaken a hopeless task."—ROBERT B. DRUMMOND: Acad., xxv. 254.

Longuet Higgins.)
"The volumes possess a general and a special claim to public attention. Crowded as they are with anecdotes and with personal traits, they have attractions for the Pepyses and Boswells of the nineteenth century. But they also appeal, in the first place, to all who are interested in the religious life of the century, and especially to all who are students of the Tractarian movement and its subsequent development. They appeal in the second place, to Oxonians in particular, as a precious portrait-gallery of Oxford worthes, and an invaluable collection of reminiscences respecting the lives and characters of some of her most distinguished sons."—Ath. "His early life was spent as a beggar. At the age of fifty-seven he was at the same time a pamper and president of the Burns Club in Edinburgh. On the occasion of the Burns centenary he made a speech which was reported at full length in the Scotsman. He now gladly availed himself of an opportunity of going to America, and at the age of sixty he landed in that country with his wife and four children, and exactly twelve and sixpence in ready money. He complains that while in America he and his family were 'completely isolated from society.'... When he was seventy, he succeeded in getting in appointment as inspector of stores under the Great Eastern Railway Company... At the age of eighty he received another grant from the Royal Laterary Fund, and then he went to live with his daughters at Hammersmith, where he preparted the present book for the press. It would not surprise us if twenty years hence a second volume were to appear, describing the author's various experiences, vicusitudes, and harrbreadth escapes between the ages of eighty and a hundred... The patient reader... will find a good deal to reward him... Its most adverse critic ought at least to admit that it is a literary currosity."—Sat. Rev. 1v. 608. Sat. Rev , Iv 608.

at Bedford, Eng; educated at Harrow School and in Germany; was gazetted cornet in a cavalry regiment at the age of sixteen, and rose to the rank of lieutenantcolonel in 1880. He was remarkable for his great statare and enormous strength and his thirst for adventure, combined with a familiarity with several languages, including Turkish and Arabic, and a facile pen. He travelled in various countries, made many balloon-ascents, some of which were attended with great danger; was correspondent of the Times in Spain during the Carlist rebeltion of 1874, and in the Soudan, whither he accompanied General Gordon in the same year, and acquired celebrity by a journey on horseback into Central Asia in the winter of 1875-76, when he penetrated as far as Khiva, but was then recalled at the request of the Russian government. In 1876-77 he made a similar tour in Asia Minor, and in the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78 he commanded for a short time a Turkish brigade. He held a command as a volunteer in General Graham's expedition in the Eastern Soudan in 1884, and in the expedition sent to the relief of General Gordon in the following year, and was killed in the battle at Abu Klea. The dement of Captain Burnaby as a traveller, or at any rate as a traveller in Russian Asia, is that he writes with an overpowering prepossession. . . A one-sided book may, however, be an instructive one, and Captain Burnaby's book is unquestionably instructive. He has written a large number of successful burlesques and other pieces for the stage, including a burlesque of Douglas Jerrold's nautical drama Black-Eyed Susan, which had a run of over four hundred consecutive nights in London, and a comedy called The Colonel, which was equally successful. He has been for a number of years one of the chief contributors to Punch, and in 1880, on the death of Mr. Tom Taylor, he became its editor. 1. "Of the many 'Happy Thoughts' which have occurred either to Mr. Burnand or his hero, the thought of having such thoughts is the happiest. . . . Utterly ludicrous as his characters are, they are neither monstrosities nor abortions. They are exaggerations of what is perfectly real, living 'humours' combined too coplously, but not invented. They have too many sides, and each side is brought out in turn with too much completeness. But in every case the skelcton is familiar to us. When Mr. Burnand begins to sketch in the first outlines, we recognize them at once, and perhaps we wonder at the absence of all novelty. But then he overlays them with such a vivid wealth of caricature that we forget our first impression, and give ourselves up to the most uncritical enjoyment."

"He has undeniably discovered a vein of facetiousness almost peculiar to himself, and works it with an industry and a success that is really surprising. It is, indeed, true that the fun is not brought from far below the surface. Nobody will suspect Mr. Burnand of being a deep thinker or a powerful satirist on the strength of his incessant flow of rather small jokes. The strain upon the intellect of author or of readers is remarkably small; and it is partly to that circumstance that his popularity is owing. "—Sol. Rev., xxxvill. 90.

"He allows himself an amount of dogmatizing, in presence of nature, which is not only unattractive but quite unsafe... We own to liking Mr. Burroughs best when he is least controversial, and when, on the other hand, he gives us something more than simple narrative....

On the whole, this mist be pronounced one of Mr. Burroughs's best books. It shows more depth of thought than some of his writings; more care in execution than others: there is none of that occasional coarseness which marred some of his earlier descriptions; and he only gives two pages to Walt Whitman."—Nation, xxxiii. 16.

And yet it does not seem at the end that we had been much out of doors. . . The book has a literariness which . . . interferes sedly with the simplicity of the common sounds and sights of nature which it reports."—Nation, xlii. 410.

"Described by the author as 'sketches of the ways of book-collectors, scholars, literary investigators, desultory readers, and other persons whose pursuits revolve round books and literature.' It is a book pleasant to look at and pleasant to read,—pleasant, from its rich store of anecdote, its geniality, and its humour, even to persons who care little for the subjects of which it treats, but beyond measure delightful to those who are in any degree members of the above-mentioned fraternity."—Sat Rev., xv. 504.

By complying with this peremptory condition Burton has distanced all competitors, but must in turn give way when one shall arise who, emulating or borrowing his closeness of investigation, shall add the beauty and grandeur due to the history of a great and romantic country."—R. Burton, Sir Richard Francis, K.C.M.G., F.R.G.S., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1821-1890. He passed several years of his early life with his parents in France and Italy; was subsequently entered at Oxford, but, having obtained a commission in the army, left the university and went to India in 1842, and after eight years of active service in the Bombay army, chiefly on the staff of Sir Charles Napier, entered on a career of travel and exploration, for which his love of adventure, his great linguistic attainments, and his intercourse with people of many different races qualified him in a high degree. chief expeditions were to Medina and Mecca in 1853; to East Africa in 1855; to Central Africa (resulting in the discovery of Lake Tanganyika) in 1856-58; to the West Coast of Africa in 1861; and through the regions of South America lying south of Brazil in 1867; besides journeys across the United States, in Ireland, in Syria, &c. Probably no other traveller has ever explored so many diverse countries. His connection with the army, in which he attained no higher rank than that of captain, ceased in 1861, and since then he has been in the consular service, having held appointments at Fernando Po, Santos, (Brazil,) Damascus, and since 1872 at Trieste. He has received the gold medals of the English and French Geographical Societies. "There are . . . a good many ingenious remarks and some caustic hits in the book; elsewhere it degenerates into somewhat commonplace and easy satire; and, on the whole, the allegory scenes to be rather too far-fetched and complicated to have the desired brillancy of effect."—Sat. author's name on the title-page.)
"It purports to be a posthumous essay in defence of Christianity, and a memoir of the writer; but we cannot help doubting whether this elaborate framework is not a mere dramatic setting to views exactly the opposite of those apparently advocated. . . . The theory which . . . emerges as the most definite suggestion of the book is one that we have been often surprised not to find more prominent in rationalistic explanations of Christianity,—that Christ did not die upon the cross at all."—Spectator, xlvi. 1440.

that Christ did not die upon the cross at all."—Spectator, xlvi. 1440.

4. Life and Habit, Lon., 1877, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1878.
"The main thesis of 'Life and Habit' is a suggestion towards the completion of the Darwinian theory, meaning thereby not so much the particular explanations most relied on by Mr. Darwin himself as the general doctrine of the continuity of life which does not belong to Mr. Darwin alone, but which Mr. Darwin more than any other man has made people believe in."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 19.
"The form which Mr. Butler's statements assume is frequently full of humour, but underlying all the fun there is a deep and serious purpose. The form is peculiarly his own, the scope of the argument he has in common with many thinkers of the present time. He is in full sympathy with the stream of tendency in science which strives to make religion, and ethics, and spiritual life merely problems in natural history. Readers of the voluminous and popular writings of Von Hartmann will observe a striking resemblance between his methods and results and those of Mr. Butler. . . Unconscious intelligence, will, and purpose are with both the great solvents of all difficulties."—Spectator, Ii. 187.

"Here is a work of consummate ingenuity, rare literary skill, and a certain happy vein of sardonic humour,—a work pregnant with epigram, sparkling with wit, and instinct throughout with a powerful original fancy,—flung out upon the world in the uncongenial guise of a scientific treatise, and scarcely likely ever to meet the eyes of anybody except those who will regard it merely in the light of a fulle piece of vain argument against Charles Darwin's theory of natural selection."—Grant Allen: Acad., Yax 413.

"More than half his book is taken up with onslaughts of great vigour and minute detail on Mr. Herbert Spencer, Prof. Ray Lankester, Mr. Romanes, Mr. Grant Allen, and most of all on Mr. Darwin. . . . We still believe that he is on the right track in seeing the motive power of evolution in mind, not matter, for therein is the difference between the two views. But because we think he is upholding the important truth we regret to see hun damaging it by needless and often petty aspersions of the upholders of the opposite views."—Ath., No. 3091.

Buxton, Mrs. Bertha H., (Leupold,) 1844–1881, was of German parentage, her mother being Madame Thérèse Leupold, well known in musical circles. She was educated at a boarding-school in London, and in her fourteenth and fifteenth year she travelled with her parents in America, Germany, and Holland. At the age of sixteen she was married to Henry Buxton, club manager and author. In 1875 she found herself suddenly poverty-stricken, and, becoming dependent on her own exertions, she turned to writing for a living. She was for some time a "walking lady" in a theatre at Exeter, and the knowledge of theatrical matters thus acquired was turned to account in some of her novels. 1. Percy's Wife: a Story. By B. H. B. Ruxton. Chaptes. [aute, vol.] add 1 1823 1871

Buxton, Charles, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1823-1871, third son of Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge; became a partner in the brewery with which his father was connected, and was elected to Parliament in 1857, 1859, and 1865, retaining his seat till his death. Besides his biography of his father, (ante, vol. i,) which went rapidly through three editions, he published a pamphlet on National Education in Ireland, (1853.) and another on Self-Government for London, (1869.) 1. Biographical Sketch by Rev. J. Llewelyn Davies, M.A. Lon., 1873, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1883.

"These posthumous 'Notes of Thought' are full of delicate observation and reflection, and go far to justify in itself the remark quoted by Mr. Llewelyn Davies from Mr. W. E. Forster.—Mr. Charles Buxton's cousin,—that the gap which Mr. Buxton has left is bigger even than the place which he scenned to fill in society."—Spectator, xivi. 110.
"It consists of a series of reflections, written down apparently as they presented themselves, on a variety of subjects, religious, social, or political... The book well deserves to be popular, if only as showing how excellent a life may be led in spite of the disadvantage of almost unmixed prosperity and domestic comfort."—Sut. Rev., xxx. 55.

"Dividing the past history of words into three sets of laws,—those of their original production, those of their subsequent change in utterance or form, and those of their subsequent change in meaning,—the declares that only the second set have been investigated with any considerable success, that very little progress has been made in the third set, and that inquiry into the first set has been pronounced to be at present chimerical. simes: a Story of Creole Life, N. York, 1880, 12mo.

"In painting the Creole life of New Orleans at the beginning of the century he has in effect broken new ground, and, as the soil is rich, one's first impression is that he has contented himself with merely overturning it. But, rich as it is, it needs an artist to exploit it with the success shown in 'The Grandissimes,' and Mr. Cable is a literary artist of unusual powers. . . The poetic vein in Mr. Cable is well developed and defined, and the picture he conjures up from the old Louisiana levees and swamps is steeped in sentiment. . . It would be doing 'The Grandissimes' an injustice, however, to imply that it is only a charming picture cleverly painted. It deals with graver elements of social existence than mere picturesqueness; and though the society it depicts no longer exists, and its problems have been solved by time, it is none the less a serious and important work. . . What prevents 'The Grandissimes' from taking the front rank in contemporary fiction is its weakness in portraiture of an intellectual interest."— university in 1873. 1. An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion, Glas 70w, 1880, 8vo.

"The book is Hegelfan throughout. It is a remarkable book in many ways.—remarkable in that it proceeds from the pen of a Scottish clergyman, bred in the Presbyterianism of Scotland, nurtured on the metaphysic of the Scotlish school and on the theology of the Westminster Confession. It is remarkable also for its marvellous power of exposition and graceful subtlety of thought. Hegel's solution of the problems of religion is at length adequately represented in English literature. Hegelianism has never appeared so attractive as it appears in the clear and fluent pages of Principal Caird. It must be confessed, however, that the book is hard reading. We feel that we are learning a new language. . . . Hegelianism is without relation to the speech which men use, to the process by which they reason. —Spectator, Ilii. 692.

and Lon., 1885, 4to.

"In opening up those rich mines of poetic and romantic legend for which the West Highlands have always been famous. Lord Archibald Campbell in this handsome volume has done something more than give the public a chapter of family or even local history. As such, indeed, the book is sufficiently fascinating for there is scarcely a tale told here which was not worth the telling); but it is a really valuable acquisition to the student of anthropology.

So handsome a volume as this is not often issued from the press. Evidently no expense has been spared in getting it up. The etchings (seventeen in number) are by Mr. Charles Laurie. Though most of them are good, they are of various degrees of merit."—Ath., No. 8041.

Campbell, George Douglas, cighth Duke of Argyll, K.G., K.T., D.C.L., LL.D., [ante, vol. i., add.,] b. 1823, at Ardencaple Castle, Dumbartonshire; succeeded his father in 1847; was lord privy sent 1853-55, 1859-60, and 1880-81, postmaster-general 1855-58, and secretary of state for India 1868-74. The duke's political career has been described as that of a "Whig by family, Liberal by intellect, Independent by nature, He has taken an and Conservative by inclination." active interest in scientific research, while rejecting theories inimical to orthodox Christianity. He has been chancellor of the University of St. Andrews and rector of the University of Glasgow, has presided over a meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and has been a frequent contributor to the Contemporary Review and other periodicals. 1. "Whatever may be the merit and success of the essayist's suggestions, he at least takes up the mental position which alone can promise usefulness in the treatment of such a question. He has no reserves on the side of science. He has no hesitation on the side of religion. . . This system, which is indeed by no means new, but is expounded by the Duke of Argyll with great clearness and freshness of illustration, places the supernatural, not in a power interfering with law, but in a design contriving combinations."

"In the face of the materialistic or agnostic tendencies characteristic of so much of the spirit of modern science, he boldly takes his stand upon the older ground of an originating and overruling Mind perceptible in nature. He is able to discern a true and definite design or teleological plan, to which is due the unity which he makes it his task to demonstrate as the law of the cosmos or entire system of the universe. . . A master, on the one hand, of the processes and results which observational science has made sure, and, on the other hand, accepting without misglying or reserve the fundamental doctrines of religion as of divine authority and inspiration, he shows himself eminently qualified to hold the balance between the ciaims of science and of theism, and to vindicate that unity and harmony in the whole domain of thought which he views as the goal of all weil-directed speculation."—Sat. tion."—Sat. Rev., Ivii. 791.

"Any readaptation of theology towards the new thought inaugurated by Darwin will scarcely take the line of a direct denial of the brain-conceptions which underlie the theory of evolution, the continuity of existence and development due to laws working within the cosmos. The force of the late Prof. Green's attempted reconstruction of the religious ideal lay in his recognition of this need and his attempt to meet it. . . . In his attempt to return to the more mechanical theology of the last century the Duke of Argyll has not advanced the cause of religion nor aided the all-important reconciliation of science and religion."

"It is a contribution rather to the solution of the agrarian problem in Scotland than to its history... The Duke of Argyll always writes well in the rhetorical sense. In such sense he never wrote better than in 'Scotland as it was and as it is,' for in it he lights for his own hand, and his own (as he thinks) land."—WILLIAM WALLACE: Acad., xxxi. 175.

"The work is essentially an applace of the same problem.

"The work is essentially an apology, a defence not merely of his political and economic principles, but of his very existence as a great landed proprietor, the inheritor of broad ancestral acres. . . . Some will think that the duke's cause needs no defence, and some that it is indefensible. But both should study his work, which in truth, is a gage of championship and defiance."—Ath., No. 3098.

Campbell, Rev. John McLeod, D.D., 1800-1872, b. at Kilninver, Argyleshire, Scotland, and educated at Glasgow University. He completed his theological studies at Edinburgh, was licensed as a preacher in 1821, and in 1825 was appointed to the parish of Row, near Cardross. About 1830 he was found guilty by the General Assembly of teaching heretical doctrines con-cerning "assurance" and "universal atonement," and was deprived of his living. In 1833 he became minister of a congregation in Glasgow, and retained that position till 1859, receiving no remuneration for his labors, but exercising by his preaching and writing a considerable influence on religious thought in Scotland. 1. "Were Mr. Campion's volume a work of fiction, instead of being, as it manifestly is, a most faithful record of fact, it would remind us at times, no doubt owing to the Defoelike minuteness of detail, of that most real of all works of adventure, ["Robinson Crusoe."] In one respect, however, there is a vast difference between the two,—our traveller's style is as unlike Defoe's as it is possible to conceive."—Spectator, 1ii. 502.

"Although agreement with all the author's views is scarcely possible, it is quite refreshing to meet with so much originality, backed by such close cogency of reasoning... The inherent weakness of the author's thesis is the want of demonstration... Briefly stated, the author's contention is that Koch is wrong in maintaining that the tuberole-bacillus is a pure parasite, completing its whole cycle of existence in its animal host... and passing to and infecting fresh individuals by means of dust-carried spores. Per contra, he argues that tuberole-bacillus, as we know it, is but one phase in the life-instory of a low form of vegetable, ... that it is an endemic malaria which hangs about certain rooms and districts and poisons the occupants more or less... Carleton, William, [ante, vol. i., where the year and place of his birth are incorrectly given, add.,] 1794-1869, b. at Prillisk, County Tyrone, Ireland, son of a small farmer; educated at a "hedge school," and afterwards by Rev. Dr. Keenan, of Glasslough; was subsequently a tutor in private families; commenced his literary career by a sketch entitled The Lough-Derg Pilgrim, which was published in a Dublin magazine and afterwards included with others in Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry. A long series of stories and novels followed, many of which passed through several editions, and were translated into French, German, and Italian. Notwithstanding this productiveness, he became embarrassed in his circumstances, and was granted a pension of £200, on the recommendation of many persons of all ranks and creeds. He has been described as "the truest, the most powerful, and the tenderest delineator of Irish life," (Dict. of Nat. Biog., vol. ix. p. 98.) "They form altogether a pathetic and instructive record of the private history of a woman who will henceforth be remembered and honoured, not only or chiefly because she was the wife of a man of genius, but on account of her own virtues and talents... We have no space left in which to do justice to the humour and the pungent wit, the delictions nawete, and the power of expressing spontaneous thoughts, grave and gay, in choice language, which make at least a hundred of the letters contained in these volumes worth preserving as choice specimens of letter-writing apart altogether from their personal interest."—Ath., No. 2893.

"With a little suppression of the innumerable repetitions concerning bad nights, digestion, insect annoyances, and other household matters, ... these three volumes might be compressed into two of the most fascinating in the English language. ... Were all such redundancies ... eliminated, there would remain in these volumes ample stores of vivacity, and brightness, and satire, and pathos, and patience and impatience, and humour and wit."—Specialar, Ivi. 483.

Carlyle, John Aitken, M.D., 1801-1877, younger brother of Thomas Carlyle, infin, b. at Ecclefechan, Dumfriesshire, Scotland; took his medical degree at the University of Edinburgh in or about 1825; was travelling physician to the Countess of Clare 1831-37, and to the Duke of Buccleuch 1838-43, spending most of these years in Italy. Cariyle, Thomas, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1795-1881. The notice of Carlyle ante, vol. i., covers nearly the whole period of his literary activity. After many years of toilsome struggle and gradual emergence from obscurity, the hard-won recognition of his genius had extended from a comparatively small circle to the general mass of intelligent readers. There was no longer any question as to his pre-eminence in the world of letters among his English contemporaries, and his installation as lord rector of the University of Edinburgh in 1866 was received as an expression and confirmation of the public verdict to that effect. In 1874 he accepted the Order of Merit from the Prussian government, but declined an offer made to him by Disraeli of the Grand Cross of the Bath and a pension. On his eightieth birthday a medal was presented to him, and an address signed by many persons of note in literature, science, and art. But these acknowledgments came when, like Johnson, he was old and could not enjoy them, when he was solitary and could not impart them. The death was solitary and could not impart them. of his wife during his absence in Edinburgh in 1866 deepened the gloom which had never been wholly absent from his life, and which had its original source, not in mere physical ills or in adverse circumstances, but in his mental constitution. He died on the 4th of Federal Constitution of ruary, 1881, and was buried in the kirkyard of Ecclefeehan, the offer of a burial in Westminster Abbey being declined in accordance with his own understood wish.

Within a brief period after Carlyle's death the incidents of his career and the details of his private life and family and social relations were laid bare in a degree never before witnessed in the case of any individual, however conspicuous or widely known. The immediate effect, however, was not a full and accurate view, but a distorted perspective, in which every fault or blemish was magnified and made prominent, while great and noble qualities were obscured or overlooked. Yet it may be doubted whether on the whole there has ever been a character that could have passed through such an ordeal with less of permanent stain or essential disfigurement. ment.

In regard to Carlyle's rank in literature it will remain for posterity to pronounce a decision with little aid from verdicts of his contemporaries. the diverse Although he was the first to introduce into English criticism a comprehensive and objective method of investigation as the ground of an enlightened judgment, no eminent writer of the time has been himself so little the subject of criticism of this description. Neither eulogy nor censure has been lacking, but of full and penetrative discussion no adequate specimens can be adduced. Perhaps the chief difficulty has lain in the fact that Carlyle stands alone and cannot be assigned a place in any group or class. It is rather by incidental testimony of the impression he has produced upon his age than by direct expression of opinion that we can form any forecast of the estimate which will hereafter be put upon his work. From this point of view it may not be unsafe to predict that he will be regarded as the most vivid and original of English prose writers, and the one whose influence on thought and action has been the most stimulating, wide-reaching, and profound. 1. History of Friedrich the Second, called Frederick the Great, Lon., 1858-65, 6 vols. 8vo. (The first two volumes are included in the list given ante, vol. ii.)

"If he had succeeded better in making a hero of Frederick, his history would have had much less historical value. As it is, it appears to be not only the best, but almost the only history in English which gives any account of any considerable section of German history which it is possible to read with interest or to remember when it is read in any tolerable degree. . . The six thick volumes are an immense repertory, in which something is to be found about nearly every important event in European history which was in any way whatever connected with Prussia or with Frederick. It also contains a number of detached aneedotes and personal histories so elaborate, so authentic, in some instances so inconceivably picturesque and vivid, that, wherever the book is opened, it has all the interest of a novel."—Fraser's Magazine, ixxii. 778.

"Infinitely the wittiest book that ever was written, a book with so many memorable and heroic facts, working directly, too, to practice; with new heroes, things unvoiced before; with a range of thought and wisdom the largest and the most colloquially elastic that ever was, not so much applying as inoculating to every need and sensibility of a man, so that I do not so much read a stereotype page as I see the eyes of the writer looking into my eyes, with winks and long-commanding glances, and stereoscoping every figure that passes, and every hill, river, wood, hummock, and pebble in the long perspective; and withal a book that is a Judgment Day, for its moral verdict on the men and nations and manners of modern times."—Emerson's Diary, ap. Correspondence of Cariyle and Emerson, il. 272, note.

"Although in the prophetic sight of the writer that most remarkable book may, at the moment it was written, have borne a conscious reference to events which were still.

"Although in the prophetic sight of the writer that most remarkable book may, at the moment it was written, have borne a conscious reference to events which were still future but have since most wonderfully illustrated its great theme, the world in general recognized nothing of the sort in it. The author, if he knew himself to be a roz clamantis at the time, must have been astonished at the rapidity with which his Gospel of Force triumphed as soon as it had its chance. Some of us shook our heads over it, one great man amongst us, whose place I am proud to occupy, I dare not say to fill, did not hesitate to speak words of summary condemnation; but the doctrine itself was esoteric, the words, like much else of Carlyle's, were however are avervour, but avertour only; to the ears of the many they required the sacred interpreter."—WILLIAM STUBBS, D.D., (now Bishop of Oxford;) Seventeen Lectures on the Study of Medizval and Modern History and Kindred Subjects, 60.

"Just at the time when the first instalment of Carlyle's 'Life of Frederick' was published, I found him [Macaulay] engaged in the perusal of the opening chapters. His wrath—I can use no milder word—against Carlyle's style was boundless. He read aloud to me four or five of the most Carlylean sentences, and then, throwing the book on the library table, exclaimed, 'I hold that no Englishman has the right to treat his mother-tongue after so unifilial a fashion.' . . Before a week had elapsed I was again at Holly Lodge, and he at once recurred to Carlyle's history, 'Pray read it,' he said, 'as soon as you can find time. Of course I have not got, and never shall get, reconciled to his distortions and contortions of language; but there IV.—19

And yet it has on it the image and superscription of the master. 5. Reminiscences. Edited by James Anthony Froude.

Lon., 1881, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Re-edited by Charles Eliot Norton, 1887, 2 vols. p. 8vo. (In regard to the circum-stances under which these Reminiscences were composed, and Carlyle's own views as to the editing and publication of them, compare the statements of Mr. Froude and Mr.

of them, compare the statements of Mr. Froude and Mr. Norton in their respective prefaces.)

"It is impossible to entertain any doubts as to the curious interest and value of the matter thus thrown open to the public gaze. The various reminiscences taken together, and sometimes overlapping and repeating themselves, as might be expected, form a very near approach to a full autobiography, with the singular feature that the writer does not form the central figure or hero of his story. This circumstance gives an unusual charm and freedom to the narrative. Carlyle is always discoursing of other people as his subject, and not ostensibly of himself; but the triple strand which he has thus spun supplies an almost complete history of his own life. It is sometimes harsh and rough, and often sad and sombre enough; but through it all runs and gleams the golden thread of tender recollections of his wife."—Sat. Rev., 11, 370.

"He betrays a narrowners of judgment about his contemporaries which contrasts strangely with the catholicity of his sympathies in the past. He could be both just and generous in his estimate of characters as various as Voltaire and Mahomet, Cromwell and Burns, Diderot and Cagliostro, and yet was neither just nor generous to Lambor Coleridge, Scott or Hazlitt, Wilson or De Quincey."—Ath., No. 2841.

"The style of the book is rather remarkable. It is Carlylese in its most cruptively volcame form, unrestrained by any such thought of artistic shape as that displayed in the 'Latter-lbay Pamphlets,' which it immediately preceded, and which resemble it most of all the published works. . . Abundant strokes of the writer's cunning are to be found,—little vigneties of social or personal portraiture, even now and then a landscape or two."—Sat. Rev., liv 87.

to be found,—And then a landscape or two.—Sal. Acc, liv. 87.

"A certain exaggeration of Carlyle's qualities is the note of this book. He went to Ireland in July, 1849, when he was more than usually sick with poverty and discontent; and the effects of the double sickness are visible on every page of the account of his visit, which, we may add, he never meant to publish in its present form. ... And yet what pictorial power there is in the book! It is a mere mass of rough notes, it notices only the bad side of things, but when it is read you have of that bad side an indelible impression. The squalor and the misery, the suffering and the faults, of Ireland, are graven, as it were, into the reader's mind by a pen that does not traverse only, but actually bites into it."—Spectator, Iv. 867.

8, Early Letters of Thomas Carlyle. Edited by Charles Eliot Norton. Lon., 1886, 2 vols. p. 8vo. "The contents of these volumes would be sufficiently interesting if they were nothing more than an independent supplement to the 'History of the First Forty Years of Carlyle's Life,' which was published in 1882; but their interest is greatly enhanced by the fact that they are not so much a supplement as a contradiction. Mr. Norton is one of the many outsiders to whom 'the view of Mr. Carlyle's character presented in Mr. Froude's blography has not approved itself,' and he endeavours to correct that view by printing selections from the letters written by

Carlyle himself, and addressed to him by his friends and kindred, which have been placed in his hands by Mrs. Alexander Carlyle. To copies of some, if not all, of these letters Mr. Froude had access, and Mr. Norton complains that from the documents before him he made garbled extracts, and, apparently of set purpose, omitted such portions as did not fit in with his 'view.' The charges thus brought against Mr. Froude are very grave indeed, and as in the letter which he has addressed to the Times he makes no answer to them and declines to make any it must be brought against Mr. Froude are very grave indeed, and as in the letter which he has addressed to the Times he makes no answer to them, and declines to make any, it must be assumed that he allows judgment to go by default. The gravest charges have to do with the correspondence that passed between Carlyle and his future wife before their marriage. . . . All the new light thrown on this strange business by Mr. Norton discredits Mr. Froude, and is honourable both to Carlyle and to Miss Welsh."—Ath., No.3000.

"The opportunity now afforded under Professor Norton's editorship of reading the present instalment of Carlyle's letters offers incontestable proof of how well Carlyle himself was entitled to engage the esteem of those who really knew him the most, and who were duly fitted to receive the right impressions to be gained by a study of his wonderfully complex character."—Sat. Ret., 1xii. 655.

"Mr. Froude has done his worst, or his best, and it cannot be undone. Even Mr. Eliot Norton's brilliant re-editing cannot undo it. And what is the result? Simply that we must thank either Mr. Froude or his blunder for enabling us to understand how great Carlyle really was. . . Carlyle, as we know him now, is more real, and immeasurably more impressive, than the Carlyle we knew before. The literary small-talkers may say the idol is shattered; but those to whom Carlyle was never an idol, but an instructor and inspirer, must be glad and not sorry that he has become so real to them."—WALTER LEWIN: Acad., xxxii. 128. "He alone has associated the life of work with all that in former days men have associated exclusively with the life of arms. Carlyle hated political economy, and had but scant reverence for all that it implied. His words were steeped in the richest dyes of poetry; on every page is the vividness, the colouring, of romance. But on almost every page also is the appeal which, till he wrote, men only knew in the dialect of prose. He spoke the word for our ago, but he spoke it in a language for which, except from him, we must turn to the past. He brought the wealth of feudal and chivairic life to enrich the sermon of the nineteenth century. He set before the toiler of to-day, amid the dust and fog of a prosaic age, the glowing ideal that seemed lost with those vanished ages. He set to music a lesson which, except from him, was associated only with the multiplication-table. Surely we need no other explanation of the vast hold on his generation which has been revealed by his death."—Spectator, iiv. 1437.

"Great and death!ses writer as he was, he will be honoured by posterity for his influence on human life, rather than for his supremacy as a literary artist. 'The way to test how much he has left his country,' says a great writer of another country, were to consider, or try to consider, for a moment, the array of British thought, the resultant ensemble of the last fifty years, as existing to-day, but with Carlyle left out. It would be like an army with no artillery.' The true legend for his monument is the dying witness of John Sterling: 'Towards England no man has been and done like you.'"—RICHARD GARNETT: Life of Carlyle, ("Great Writers,") 178.

"As a representative author, a literary figure, no man else will bequeath to the future more significant hints of our stormy era, its fierce paradoxes, its din, and its struggling parturition-periods, than Carlyle... Rugged, mountainous, volcanic, he forth their opposites by a sort of celestial affinity. . . . His literary faculty, if not perfect,—very few are perfect.—was extraordinary and magnificent in the extreme. His supreme gift is his penetrating imagination, of seeing as it were into the heart of things in a moment, and reproducing them in words which it is impossible to forget. . . In this respect he well deserves the epithet of poet, much more than many metrical and musical persons. . . And he sees so much and so well outside himself because he has so much inside because, by his own richness of thought and feeling, he comes ready prepared to observe, to note to recognize things when they present themselves. . . Carlyle's depth of insight into character was owing to the depth and capacity of his own nature. He had lived the lives of a dozen men before he put pen to paper, by reason of the passions with which he had become intimate in his own breast. In the next place, his hard peasant life, his education in the school of poverty, had made him acquainted with fact at first hand. He had not been shielded, like the unfortunate rich, from wholesome collision with realities. . . The combined result of his natural endowment and his stimulating training was to make him the most figurative and imaginative prose writer in our language. All nature seems under his sway for colours and image,—seems to offer him, as it were, the right suggestive thing to express his thought."—JAMES COTTER MORISON: Macmillan's Magazine, xivii. 200-212.

Carpenter, Mary, 1807-1877, b. at Exeter, Eng., daughter of the Rev. Lant Carpenter, LL.D., [q. v., ante, vol. i.,] was educated by her father. Her life was devoted to philanthropic work, especially to the establishment and management of reformatory schools. She made several visits to India between 1868 and 1876, drew up reports on subjects connected with education and reform, and established a National Indian Association for the promotion of fuller intercourse and understanding between India and England. In 1873 she visited the United States and Canada, and delivered addresses on prison reform. For biog., see CARPENTER, J. ESTLIN, supra. 1. "Dr. Carpenter has collected in this volume the researches and systematic thought of many years on the relations between the mind and its organism, and on the application of the conclusions arrived at to the best training of the mind for the purpose of the proper use of its organism, and of the best training of the organism to make it a suitable instrument for the mind. The result is check full of reliable force and of theories cometimes organism, and of the best training of the organism to make it a suitable instrument for the mind. The result is a book full of valuable facts, and of theories sometimes certainly true, sometimes disputable, sometimes in our opinion erroneous, but always worth attentive consideration. . . . Dr. Carpenter grasps the broad distinction between the mental constitution imposed upon us, and the modifications of it which we make for ourselves, most vigorously, and the importance he attaches to it runs through the whole volume, and may be said almost to constitute its value."—Spectutor, xivii. 884.

"In the author of this book is found the ritualist in the true sense of the term: and in his patient research, his careful comparison of varying uses and gradually developing rites, his abundant collation and citation of ecclesiastical authorities on the most minute points of detail, may be read an instructive commentary—however unintentional—upon the loves and all informed chatter on such tional—upon the loose and ill-informed chatter on such subjects, from whichever side proceeding, with which our own times have become familiar to weariness."—Sat. Chambers, Robert, LL.D., [ante, vol. i., Chambers, William and Robert, add.,] 1802-1871, so closely associated during his lifetime, both as publisher and author, with his brother William, has a posthumous rep-utation all his own, as the author of Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation, published anonymously in 1844. The secret of the authorship was kept very closely, in accordance with a rule made by the brothers to "avoid as far as possible mixing themselves up with debatable questions in politics and theology." The proofs of the book were sent to Mr. Alexander Ireland. of Manchester, and forwarded by him under fresh covers to the author. The work was attributed to different persons, but as early as 1854 the conjectures had already settled upon Robert Chambers. The questions raised in Vestiges of Creation were flercely debated for some years; it was generally regarded as an attack on ortho-doxy. The author, however, himself a religious man, had regarded the matter as a purely scientific one. I. History of the British Empire. 2. "The plan of the work deserves praise and its execution is, on the whole, commendable.... It is a matter of course in a compilation so comprehensive and complex as this is ... that many mistakes should present themselves... Our wonder is that they are not much more numerous, for the pages are crammed with minute particulars, to gather which, even without critical weighing of authorities one against the other, must have been a work of stupendous labour."—Ath., No. 3192.

Chesney, Charles Cornwallis, 1826-1876, b. near Kilkeel, in Ireland; son of an East India artillery captain, and nephew of General Francis Rawdon Chesney, educated at the military academy at Woolwich, and entered the Royal Engineers as sub-lieutenant in 1845. He served in Ireland and Bermuda, and was ordered to New Zealand in 1854, but his delicate health obliged him two years later to return to England. He was appointed professor of military history at the Royal Military Staff College at Sandhurst, and was soon recognized as the best military critic of his day, his Waterloo Lectures being adopted as a text-book in French and German as well as English military schools. He served on important military commissions, became lieutenant-colonel in 1868, and brevet colonel in 1873, with the command of the home district of the Royal Engineers. mand of the nome district of the Royal Engineers.

2d ed., rev., Lon., 1868, 8vo. 4. Waterloo Lectures: a Study of the Campaign of 1815, Lon., 1868, 8vo; 3d ed., 1874.

"The work is extremely valuable, but, as it bears everywhere the impress of the naked truth, it is intensely unflattering to the national vanity of both French and English. Romantic stories concerning the campaign, which have hitherto passed current with all the air of military authority, are ruthlessly dissected, the one-sided praise which has been indiscriminately heaped on Napoleon and Wellington by their own admirers is considerably modified, and the real importance of the Prussian intervention in the final action is fairly and honestly shown."—Sal. "The render, of whatever profession, who can appreciate an uncommonly clear, refined, and forcible style will find his taste amply gratified in the perusal of these essays. The subjects, too, are of a striking kind, and the blographical character of the volume imparts unity to scenes and events which occupy considerable space in the history of nations. But their chief value is for the military student.

... Whether illustrating an epoch from the personal experience of a minor actor in the scenes depleted, such as De Fezensac and Brandt, or presenting a leader in the light of his own achievements, as in the essays on Lee, and Grant, and 'Chinese Gordon,' he falls not to give us new and faithful impressions."—Sal. Chesney, Francis Rawdon, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1789-1872, b. in County Down, Ireland; was gazotted to the Royal Artillery at the age of sixteen, and attained the rank of lieutenant-general, but never had an oppor-tunity of serving in the field. In 1831, 1835-37, and 1856, he made expeditions through Syria and the Euphrates valley, with the view of opening a new route to India. For biog., see Chesney, Mrs. Louisa, infra. "The present volume is not the most important which General Chesney has published as the fruit of his survey.

... The volume now before us only sums up the record by showing the personal labour with which the results attained were won.

... It is agreeably written, full of striking incidents, and has novelty enough to float any book of travels, though written so long after the event.

"If . . . there is something fascinating in Mr. Christie's narrative, the reason must lie in the fact that the career of the unfortunate Lyons printer illustrates with extraordinary distinctions one of the most remarkable phases of the movement to which he may truly be said to have borne witness in his life and in his death. . . . His [the author's] wish has evidently been to furnish a solid contribution to the history of learning and letters; and as such his volume seems to us likely to survive, even apart from the value it will possess for the fraternity of bibliographers and bibliophiles."—Sal. "Mr. Christie has undertaken the justification of one whose brilliant powers no one denies, but who is commonly held to have abused them for the basest of purposes. . . He does not set up the subject of his biography as a paragon of unusual virtue: he is satisfied with trying to show that the worst crimes laid to his charge are certainly laise, and that there is something to be said for most of the doubtful parts of his actions. He asks us to believe that Shafesbury was not the double-dyed villain that he appears in the pages of Lord Macaulay and Lord Campbell. Mr. Christie has been more successful in clearing Shafesbury of great crimes than in giving a favourable impression of his general political conduct. —Sat. Ren., xxxii. 308, 339. See, also, Trall, H. "He generalizes freely, but his generalizations are guarded and qualified so carefully that the untrained mind may easily fall to grasp these; the charm of his style lies in its sweetness, its subtlety, its singular flexibility in expressing the many shades of one idea, rather than in the bold and foreible presentation of views that are easy to catch and not difficult to hold. . . He represents mational character by means of types and specimens: thus the Greeks stand for the European races belonging to the Eastern Church, and the Italians and French for the Southern or so-called Latin races."—Sat. Rev., xxxvii. 84.

Admirable in intention, kind in temper, candid in

"Admirable in intention, kind in temper, candid in spirit, earnest in purpose, this volume occupies a place in theological literature which ought to have been filled before, but which until now has remained empty... The government of the American Unitarian Association, by the hand of Dr. Clarke, makes an honest attempt to find and to state the truth contained in the doctrines of their opponents. . . He has the requisite erudition and the necessary familiarity with all the lines of thought. His mind is comprehensive, systematic, and exact; his judgment is just. . . . But for an occasional positiveness, verging on dogmatism, an absence here and there of philosophical perception, and an artificial cast in its logic, we should say that the theme was handled as well as we have a right to expect from anybody."—Nation, iii. 228.

"Mr. Clarke's familiarity with all the most humble details of the life of a penal settlement is far too minute. and his power of reproducing them far too graphic, to render this powerful book fit for general perusal. It ought, however, to be read by all who, while they care for literary power, are not afraid of grim detail."—Spectator, xlviii. 4298

"Every school-boy knows the names of Seward, Grant, Lincoin, and John Brown; but alas that he should be ignorant, till he reads this autobiography, that Cassius Clay did more than any man to overthrow slavery.'... It is not part of our intention to belittle Mr. Clay's services in behalf of emancipation, beginning with the liberation of his own slaves. 'I hey were heroic, and will not be forgotten... The account of his life in Russia is decidedly the most entertaining part of his rambling narrative, and makes one long for the view of him which some one of his diplomatic colleagues may have preserved in his diary or his private letters. .. After all, one closes this book with kindly feelings towards the much-daring and much-suifering author,—magnanimous, we are convinced, and not mercenary, and with a love of nature that now and then tinges his pages with the most unexpected charm.'

Clemens, Samuel Langhorne, ("Mark Twain,") [ante, vol, iii., Twain, Mark, add.,] b. 1835, at Florida, Monroe Co., Mo., was apprenticed to a printer at the age of thirteen, and, after working at that trade in different cities, became a pilot on the Mississippi river steamboats in 1851. Ten years later he went to Nevada, where he edited a paper, and he subsequently joined with Bret Harte in editing The Californian, and began to deliver humorous lectures with great success. In 1872 he settled in Hartford, Conn., where he has since resided. In 1884 he established in New York the subscription-book-publishing house of C. L. Webster & Co., which published General Grant's "Memoirs of the Civil War." Mr. Clemens is said to have taken the pseudonyme by which he is so universally known from the recollection of his experience as a pilot, the phrase "mark twain"—i.e., "mark two fathoms"—being used in taking soundings on the Mississippi. He has been a frequent contributor to periodicals, and his story The Gilded Age, written in conjunction with Charles Dudley Warner, had great success as a play, with John T. Raymond as Col. Sellers. The following list of his works includes two mentioned ante, vol. iii.: 1. The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County. Edited by J. Paul. N. York, 1867, 16mo. 2. The Innocents Abroad; or, The New Pil-grim's Progress: being some Account of the Steamship Quaker City's Pleasure Excursion to Europe and the Holy Land. Illust. Hartford, 1869, 8vo. (Of this book 125,000 copies are said to have been sold in three years.)

"All the prominent characteristics of our peculiar school of humorists—their audacity, their extravagance and exaggeration—Mr. Clemens displays in fulness in the course of his ramblings, and he has some merits which belong to his individual self, and which make him a very agreeable companion when he is at ease and natural—which is not always; for as he pads, so, we must make free to tell him, does he sometimes grimace, and is professionally a humorist as he was professionally a book-maker."—Nation, ix. 194.

CHARLES DUDLEY, The Gilded Age: a Tale of To-Day. Illust. Hartford, 1873, 8vo.

"Mr. Clemens's humor is of such a universal and comprehensive character that it is very difficult to say in what its peculiarity consists. His eminent forerunner, Artemus Ward, had a certain literary cachet which Mr. Clemens lacks. His sketches were sketches of American life and manners, grock-que and absurd as you please, but still having a distinctly national flavor. It is hardly possible to say that Artenus Ward described hie as he found it; but there was a definite literary relation between life as he saw it around him and what he wrote, which everybody recognized in his books. Mr. Clemens's humor, on the other hand, is American enough, but his inventions, which he uses as a vehicle for it, are of no nationality. There is a kind of monstrosity about them which we remember in no other writer,—a wild extravagance which is not simply that of exaggeration."—Nation, xxxv. 119.

"Mark Twain is American pure and simple. To the eastern mother-land he owes but the rudiments, the groundwork, already archaic and obsolete to him, of the speech he has to write; in his turn of art, his literary methods and aims, his intellectual habit and temper, he is as distinctly national as the fourth of July itself."—Ath. Clissold, Rev. Augustus, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1797?-1882, brother of Henry Clissold, infra, was educated at Oxford, ordained in 1823, and made curate of Stoke Newington. Enthusiasm for the writings of Swedenborg led him about 1840 to give up his clerical office and to devote himself to the translation and spread of Swedenborg's works. He was connected with the Swedenborg Association and Swedenborg Society, which he aided largely with money, translated and printed at his own expense some of Swedenborg's works, and wrote numerous pamphlets and volumes illustrating the doctrine of the New Church. The following list includes two or three works mentioned aute, vol. i.: 1. down to the death of Paul Ferroll.)

"Paul Ferroll, although a condensed, vigorous, and interesting story, is rather an evidence of the writer's ability than absolutely excellent in itself... The incidents in the book are extremely well managed; we cannot say so much for the delineation of character. Paul Ferroll himself is, in tact, the only full-length figure: the other characters are merely accessories, supplying the requisite dramatic situations."—Ath., No. 1451.

"A book which, even if it be not destined to be morniar.

'A book which, even if it be not destined to be popular, will not be easily forgotten nor lightly esteemed by some of those into whose hands it falls. . . . It is not so much a picture of life as a 'study' from life, and to appreciate the study one must seize the key to it, and place oneself at the point of view from which the scene is taken."—Sat. 10. John Greswold. By the Author of "Paul Ferroll." Lon., 1864, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"John Greswold' is not only a good book, but it is one whose merits are even less easily pointed out than those of most good books. . . No doubt there is a certain charm in the style. . . Perhaps the secret of 'John Greswold' is exceeding simplicity of incident, combined with the most careful treatment of details. . . The whole picture is natural and unartificial in the highest degree."—Sat. Rev.,

Cobbe, Miss Frances Power, b. 1828, in the county of Dublin, Ireland, and educated at Brighton, Eng. After a visit to Italy and the East, she resided for some years at Bristol with Mary Carpenter, supra, whom she assisted in her reformatory and ragged schools, and later she interested herself in plans for helping young servant-girls and for the relief of destitute incurables. Her attention had been early directed to theological reading, and she was deeply impressed with the writings of Theodore Parker, with whom she opened a correspondence which led to a warm friendship. She has brought out an edition of his works in England, and may be regarded as an exponent of his line of thought. On returning from Italy Miss Cobbe settled in London, where she has been known as an earnest writer and practical worker in matters relating to the higher education and political enfranchisement of women, and the suppression of vivisection. She has been a constant contributor to the reviews and other periodicals. She has lately lived in re-tirement in Wales. 1. "Sir Robert Peel particularly urged a correspondent to attempt an 'historical account of the villas in the neighbourhood of London.' He especially referred to those which were mentioned in what he called 'Horace Walpole's song about Strawberry Hill; but, he added, there were 'a hundred others with very curnous ancedutes of local and personal history connected with them,' and he wound up by saying, 'the county histories would furnish a substratum for the work, but everything would depend upon the hyeliness and accuracy of the details.' Such a work as is here sketched out, executed in a manner that would have satisfied the sketcher, would be one of the most delightful volumes that ever charmed mankind.

. We must thank Mr. Cobbett for giving us a book which, if not so good as it ought to be, is at least one step in advance of its predecessors."—Nat. Rev., xxxiv, 378.

vicar of Wadhurst since 1887; canon residentiary and prebendary of Chichester Cathedral 1888. The Melansian Languages, Oxf., 1885, 8vo.

"The expectations raised by a preliminary paper recently read before the Anthropological Institute have been amply realized by Mr. Codrington's present work, which for the first time places the comparative study of the Melanesian tongues on a solid foundation. . . . it consists of two essentially distinct parts,—a general survey of all the Oceanic tongues constituting the so-ceilled Malayo-Polynesian family, and a separate study of thirty-five more or less typical languages current in the New Hebrides . . and other Melanesian insular groups. The results of this scarching investigation are in some respects so startling that they will scarcely meet with universal assent without further research."—Sat. Rev., ixi. 58.

"The book is written with all the ripe knowledge of one who has lived and taught for years among the natives of Melanesia, and it offers a welcome courtibution to the solution of an obscure problem of scientific philology. . . . Dr. Codrington . . . scems to think that the Melanesian is racially, as well as linguistically, connected with the Polynesian and Malay; but his arguments have certainly brought no conviction to my mind, and his view is opposed to that of the most eminent ethnologists. It is only incidentally, however, that he glances at the question of race. His book is concerned, not with ethnology, but with the Melanesian languages, a subject on which he supplies an abundance of material that makes a revision of our old opinions necessary. . . . The conclusion reached by Dr. Codrington is that the Melanesian languages have the an abundance of material that makes a revision of our of opinions necessary... The conclusion reached by Dr. Codrington is that the Melancsian languages have the same origin as the Malayan and Polynesian... Dr. Codrington certainly seems to me to have proved the main point of his contention."—A. H. SAYCE: Acad., xxviii, 429.

"In Mr. Charles C. Coffin we have a traveller after the latest and best Transatlantic pattern. He has thrown himself thoroughly into the spirit of his age and race, yet, while loyal to the backbone, and endorsing to the full his country's claims to present grandeur and future pre-eminence, he has a corner in his soul for the merits of other lands, and is open to the lessons of Old-World wisdom."—

While thus bending his mind to this task he was led to reexamine its familiar pages for himself. The conclusions to which he came were embodied in his commentary on Romans and critical examination of the Pentateuch. The publication of these books raised a storm in England. An attempt was made by the Bishop of Cape Town to depose, and even to excommunicate, the author, but on Colenso appealing to the crown these proceedings were declared to be legally void. "Mr. Keble has been fortunate in his biographer. Sir John Coleridge knew Keble probably as long and as intimately as any one. . . . He thoroughly understood and valued the real and living unity of a character which mostly revealed itself to the outer world by what seemed Jerks and discordant traits. . . Many people will of course except to the character. It is not the type likely to find favour in an age of activity, doubt, and change. But, as it was realized in Mr. Keble, there it is in Sir John Coleridge's pages, perfectly real, perfectly natural, perfectly whole and uniform. "Sal. Rev., xxvil. 899.

Collier, John Payne, [ante, vol. i., add.,] d. 1883. The folio Shakespeare mentioned in vol. i., which was known as the Perkins Folio from the inscription "Tho. Perkins his Booke" on the outer cover, was presented by Collier to the Duke of Devonshire, on whose death, in 1858, it fell into the hands of his successor, who, in 1859, deposited it at the British Museum for ex-This revealed the fact that the manuscript notes were recent fabrications simulating a seventeenthcentury handwriting, that they corresponded to other marginal notes made in pencil and partly rubbed out, and were themselves in some instances written first in pencil. The authenticity of the lectures published by Collier as taken from his own long-lost short-hand notes made from Coleridge's lectures was also impugned, and a genuine letter preserved at Dulwich was shown to have been cited by him with falsifications made in order to introduce Shakespeare's name. Sixteen more forgeries circulated by him were discovered at Dulwich in 1881. Collier published, in addition to works mentioned in vol. i.: 1. (Ed.) "To one fatal propensity Collier sacrificed an honourable fame won by genuine services to English literature. Apart from his labours on Shakespeare and the history of the drama, few have done more to rescue the works of less famous writers from undeserved oblivion. His critical judgment, however, was not always equal to his industry, and he was never a particularly accurate editor. Worse than this, the taint of suspicion necessarily rests upon all his work. . In literary matters he was apparently devoid of conscience."—Dict. of Nat. Biog., xi. 353.

"When one reads the long list of novels which flowed from his prolific brain-mint betwixt 1805 and 1876, the pace quickening during the last three years to two or three 'per annum,' is it to be wondered that his works of fetton are full of himself in one shape or another as the hero; that they bear the most evident marks of rapid composition; and that, as we once heard it said of them by a friendly critic, 'his plots construct themselves, and his heroes run away with him'?"—Acad., xii. 182.

"It is as a story-teller that this writer will go down to posterity, and as a story-teller his wonderful power is, we think, chiefly due to the dramatic unity which is to be traced throughout all his finer works. There is the utmost possible concentration of interest, and no irrelevant matter is allowed for a moment to intrude itself. Each work represents a design, and each character, and even each speech of the characters, assist to the fulfillment of the action whereby the design is completed."—Spectator, 1.100s. "Mr. Wilkie Collins probably does not himself expect that any of his works will live. . . But it is something to be facile princeps even in a transent school. . . . He has made what may be called the 'detective' novel his own, and—for comparisons are unnecessary—need fear no rival. He takes so much and such evident trouble over what he writes, and his workmaniship is so good and so conscientious, that the result is always, of its kind, as good as can be got. . . No one ever yet began one of his novels to throw it aside. It is possible that, having read one, we may not care to begin a second; but if we once begin it we shall most certainly finish it; for, although Mr. Collins has grave defects, he has no positive faults. . . For ingenuity, for cleverness, for power of rousing curiosity and keeping interest alive, Mr. Collins stands altogether alone. The art is not a high art, perhaps; but he has mastered it, and mastered it—as his books show—by honest industry." Ath., No. 2312.

"A critical monograph on Keats, in which should be distilled all the new material that, since the appearance of Lord Houghton's blography, has been furnished by the industry of poetical students, has long been a desideratum. .. And with regard to the book before me, on every page will be found evidence of that care and that scholarly conscience for which Mr. Colvin is distinguished even among English scholars. Every kind of information from every source has been examined with an honest sagacity which nothing can escape. .. Those who read this delightful little volume will admit that Mr. Colvin in his treatment of Keats is almost as happy as he was in his treatment of Landor."—Theodore Watts: Acad., xxxii.

"It is a treatise, as the writer says in his preface, on 'the ancient condition of Palestine from the earliest recorded times down to the close of the Flank dominion, 'discussing the 'social condition of the inhabitants, their raccorlgins, languages, religions, social customs, government, art, literature and trade.' Obviously, in a popular volume of moderate dimensions, such an extensive programme could not be exhaustively carried out; but it may be said that Captain Conder, who has enjoyed unrivalled opportunities of examining, on the spot, the archaeological remains of Syria, has also diligently studied the chief literary sources of information, and has compiled a very serviceable hand-book of Syrian antiquities."—ISAAC TAYLOR: Acad., XXX. 404.

Having Having modified, however, both his religious views and the extreme Southern political tenets in which he had been brought up, he left the Methodists and entered the Divinity School at Cambridge, Mass. He then returned to Virginia; but his course in aiding a runaway slave from his native county made him the subject of threats which obliged him to leave the State. He became pastor of a Unitarian church in Washington, from which he was dismissed for some anti-slavery discourses. In 1863 he went to England and lectured there on the civil war from a Federal and anti-slavery point of view, becoming also the minister of a Unitarian society in London, a position which he occupied until 1884, when he returned to the United States. 7. Life of Thomas Cooper. Written by Himself. Lon., 1872; new ed., 1880, p. 8vo.

"The life of a self-taught and self-raised man, who has rone through such varied experiences as have fallen to the lot of Mr. Cooper, must indeed be badly written if it fail to be here and there interesting. . . It is refreshing turn from that strangest of all tongues, the language of the so-called sensational novel, to Mr. Cooper's idiomatic English, even when his garrulity is at its flood."—Sat. Rev., xxxiii. 445.

Cooper, Thomas Thornville, 1839-1878, b. at Bishop Wearmouth, Eng., and educated at a school in that place. He went to India in 1859, and was employed for a time in a mercantile house at Madras. During the Chinese rebellion he joined the Shanghai volunteers. In 1868 he undertook to penetrate through Thibet to India, and, after traversing portions of the country never before reached by travellers, was imprisoned and forced by the authorities to return. In 1869 he made an attempt to enter China from Assam, which was also un-uccessful. He was subsequently appointed political agent at Bamo, where he was murdered by a sepoy of his guard. 1. "Written to support the theory that the large Belgic population, the infinite hominum multitudo, which Caesar found in Britain, remained with practically undiminished numbers after the Roman conquest of this island, that they thoroughly received the stamp and impress of Roman civilization, that their largely increased numbers were, again, practically undiminished by the burbarian conquests, that the barbarians adopted many of the customs which they found in the land; in short, that Roman civilization underlies Angio-Saxon institutions, if we may use such loose and inaccurate language, and that Romanized Britain reacted upon the conquerors in a very marked and important way. We quite believe that he has made out a case for having the question which he puts reargued; and we are sure that his book will be read with pleasure, if not with approval, by all whose tastes and studies lead them to take an interest in the subject."—Spectator, Il. 640.

"We find here discussions on the relations of animals and plants, on the influence of mind in nature, and on the origin of consciousness, with others on less recondite problems. . . One of the most curious speculations to be found in this volume is the tracing of plant to animal life through a progressive automatism and loss of consciousness. . . The great fault of the book is that no attempt has been made to systematize and weld together the material of which it is composed."—Nation, xliv, 121.

"It will be read with pleasure from beginning to end.

Even some of those points in which we find this work defective as a history increase the charm of its perusal.

He never likes to reject a good story because the evidence in support of it is weak.

It is the picturesqueness more than the importance of an event upon which he loves to linger. The philosophical reflections are often rather commonplace."—Nation, xxxii. 282.

"It is sufficiently pleasant reading, and in every way excellent in tone. It tells all there is to tell of his active life; but it is weakest precisely where it had need to be strong. We cannot blame a lady for not dwelling on the scientific work; but, after all that is what we should like to hear about . . We miss those definitions of the work, those explanations of mental processes which, after all, make up the life of a man of science."—Sat Rev., lxvi.

"With the exception of three introductory chapters, which were due to the Dean of Westmuster, the whole of the work is occupied with Dr. Cotton's Indian life and work. The first three chapters are written with a charm of style and vividness of portraiture which recall the Life of Arnold, and they contain brief but extremely interesting reminiscences of Bishop Cotton by two of his most intimate friends,—Principal Snairp of St. Andrews, and the late Professor Conington. For the remainder of the volume Mrs. Cotton is almost solely responsible, and the manner in which she has executed her task is, on the whole, excellent."—Sal. Rev., xxxi. 574.

"We question whether any interpreter, native or foreign, has more truly or tersely expressed the purpose of this wondrous work than Mr. Coupland when he says, 'The theme of the drama of "Faust' is the Trial and Triumph of Man. Immaterial whether we think of the individual or the race, the story is the same—Faust is the colossal man, Faust is the long spiritual history of our planet. . . For myself, I hear this echo in every part:—Aspiration, not attainment, is the lot of man; and aspiration is only born of surrender to that spirit of unselfsh beauty which in its manifold earthly disguises is still ever of the heaven, heavenly.' This is undoubtedly the pith of the matter, and he who follows this clue will not go far astray."—Sol. Rev.

8. The Liberal Movement in English Literature, Lon, 1885, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Courthope's thesis is that, from the date of the reform of English prose and verse by 'Dryden and Pope'... to the outbreak of the Romantic movement under Wordsworth and Coleridge, ... English writers were mainly under the influence of a Conservative reaction. Since that time they have been mainly under the influence of a Liberal movement... No one who is interested in the study of English literature can afford not to read the book."—Sat. Rev., 1x. 716.

"Himself a poet and scholar of distinction, and, in ad-"Himself a poet and scholar of distinction, and, in addition, a poet and scholar strongly in sympathy with his subject, he is, above all, qualified to appraise Pope's position as a writer. Those parts of his book in which he addresses himself to this task are the most accomplished and the most instructive of his pages, and his final chapter upon Pope's place in English literature will probably set the critical tune for many years to come. In his estimate of Pope's character he has endeavoured to imitate the excellent example of Johnson... and to make the study of rope's character he has endeavoired to make the ex-cellent example of Johnson, . . . and to make the study of the writer's work his main business, in preference to moralizing upon his defects as a man."—Sat. Cox, Rt. Rev. Sir George William, Bart., M.A., b. 1827; educated at Rugby, and at Trinity College, Oxford, graduating in 1849; took orders in 1850, and, after holding some curacies in Devonshire and an assistant-mastership at Cheltenham College, became vicar of Beaksbourne, Kent, in 1881, and later in the same year was appointed rector of Scrayingham, Yorkshire. In 1886 he was made Bishop of Bloemfontein, South Africa. He succeeded to the baronetcy on the death of his uncle in 1877. He has been a contributor to the Edinburgh Review since 1857; has made a specialty of comparative mythology and ancient history, and is a prominent advocate of the sun-myth theory. 1. 9. Latin and Teutonic Christendom: an Historical Sketch, Lon., 1870.

"To the general public Mr. Cox is best known through his admirable 'Tales of Aucient Greece'... and his larger and more important work on Aryam Mythology. But if in these subjects he is a zealous disciple and fellow-labourer of Professor Max Müller's, he is hardly a less keen admirer of the late accomplished historian of Latin Christianity, though we doubt whether he has brought the same amount of independent research to bear on Christian history as on that of the ancient religions and civilization of Greece and the remoter East."—Sat. Rev., xxx. 562.

10. A History of Greece: vols. i. and ii., Lon., 1874,

"In the main it may be said that, while continually consulting the original authorities, Mr. Cox has drawn most of his facts and arguments directly from the perusal of Mr. Grote's work.

... They had both the same quarry to dig from; but if Mr. Cox had gone directly to the quarry and not so often to Mr. Grote, there would not be such frequent coincidences in the mode of expression, and there would be a greater difference in the historical illustrations.

... Mr. Cox's history is remarkably well written. The book is interesting in the highest degree. The tone of it throughout is healthy and high. The reader will find many instructive allusions to other fields of historical inquiry; and he will be able to form a clear picture of the development of the Athenian and Spartan characters and politics, and of part of the work which the Greek nation performed in the history of the world."—Ath., No. 2424.

"The literary charm of his work is very great. There is a freshness and frankness in the style, a directness and vigour of diction, together with touches of dry humour every now and then, which delight the reader and carry him over the interminable ins and outs of papal and Italian intrigue. The book is as fascinating as a romance; and yet there is never for a moment a suspicion that strict and rigid accuracy has been sacrificed to picturesque effect."—Acad., xxxii. 33.

Croil, James, LL.D., F.R.S., 1821-1890, b. at Little Whitefield, Perthshire, Scotland; attended school for five years, but was mainly self-educated, acquiring while young a pretty extensive knowledge of the fundamental principles of natural philosophy. He was apprenticed to a millwright when about sixteen years old, and worked at that trade for eight years, when he was obliged from the effects of an accident to give it up. He was afterwards an insurance agent. From the age of twenty-five to forty he gave much attention to the study of metaphysics. In 1859 he became keeper of the Andersonian University and Museum in Glasgow, retaining that post until 1867, when he joined the Geological Survey of Scotland, from which he retired in 1881. He published in scientific journals and in the Transactions of learned societies about ninety separate memoirs and papers on geological climatology, which attracted wide atten-tion and are regarded as important contributions to the literature of physical geography and geology. 1. "This is one of the most philosophical contributions which have been made to the science of geology within the last half-century. Every page of this volume is distinguished by close and earnest thought, and the conclusions arrived at by the author are, whether we accept them or not, the result of striking powers of deductive analysis."—Alh., No. 2488.

"He has, in my humble opinion, been the first to recognize the full importance of one of the agencies which, under possible conditions, may have profoundly affected the climate of the globe during past epochs, although I do not believe that, in the present state of our knowledge, we can safely draw those positive inferences at which he has arrived. Even those who are unable to accept any portion of his theory as to the causes of past changes of climate must feel indebted to his writings for numerous valuable suggestions, and for the removal of many popular opinions which his acute criticism has shown to be untenable"—John Ball: Notes of a Naturalist in South America, Appendix B.

Cross, John Walter. George Eliot's Life, as related in her Letters and Journals. Arranged and edited by her Husband. Edin. and Lon., 1885, 3 vols. p.

"The novel method of extracts arranged in order of time tells the tule spontaneously, and George Eliot the woman stands forth revealed to the world in all the strength time tells the tule spontaneously, and George Eliot the woman stands forth revealed to the world in all the strength and refinement of her intellect, in all the clinging trustfulness of her moral and emotional nature. . . This stern independence of intellect combined with a complete dependence on others for the emotional life gives the characteristic tone throughout her life, and we are continually coming across a severe philosophical disquisition side by side with an outburst of uncontrollable affection or longing. She has doubtless portrayed this side of her nature in Maggie Tulliver, with her impulsive affection, her emotional dependence on others. But she had recognized it much earlier when speaking of herself as 'tyy-like as I am by nature,' and in this peculiarly womanly quality she remained a very woman to the last. Manly intellect and girlish heart were united in her to an unusual degree. This problematic nature serves to explain—so far asit bears explanation—the crux of her life—her union with George Henry Lewes. . . She had evidently found in him some one to cling to amid the dreary solitude of life in London lodgings. . . The predominance of the philosophic over the artistic spirit in George Eliot has tended to make these volumes, containing the record of her private life, rather dull and—dare we say it?—commonplace. She was a great woman, but this is not a great book. Like all thinkers, she intended to weave a web of theory between herself and life, and seemed to reserve all her humour and liveliness for her books."—4th., Nos. 2988, 2989.

"A biography so constituted is as artificial a production as was ever put before the world. . . . This kind of intellectual mosaic work cannot produce a life-like picture.... All the didactic side of George Eliot's character is fairly represented by the extracts from her letters and journals. We see, and it is most interesting to see, her intense precocupation with the truths which she pressed upon her readers.... Unfortunately, Mr. Cross's admiration for the moral and, so to speak, religious side of his wife's character has, in the description he has given of her, caused him strangely to leave out of view the amazing gifts of humor and imagination which rendered it possible for George Eliot to interest the world in her teaching."—Nation, xl. 283.

and imagination which rendered it possible for George Eliot to Interest the world in her teaching."—Nation, xl. 283.

"Of the actual events of George Eliot's not very eventful life these volumes tell little that was not known before, but as a commentary on her works they are simply invaluable. . . . The way in which these volumes are saturated with what may be called the cant of Freethinking, the goody-goodlines of irreligion, the unction of the antisupernatural, the gush of Positivism and Nihilism, might be disagreeable if it were not exceedingly interesting. The moral and intellectual atmosphere is that of the classroom and the tea-party, only that the experiences are anti-Christian and the proceedings are opened with a chapter of Strauss instead of a chapter of the Bible. . . . It will probably provoke screams from her admirers, but we say hardily that if at the time when she fell under Lewes's male influence she had fallen under the male influence of an orthodox Churchman she would probably have been a pillar of the faith and a brand plucked from the burning. The person whom superficial critics long took to be the most masculine of her sex was a very woman."—Sal. Rev., lix. 181.

"Taken as a whole, this Life leaves us with the impression of a lofty mind of singularly feeble instincts and singularly amiable sentiments,—somewhat slow and elaborate in its movements, and almost artificially judicial in its stitude towards every new intellectual claim. A sceptical Milton, without his epic genius, though with a very read dramatic gift of her own, we yet never see that gift in anything which she writes in her own name."—Spectator, 1vil. 151.

"Mr. Cross has done his work, as far as we can discern, lviii, 151.

"Mr. Cross has done his work, as far as we can discern, with admirable judgment, fine feeling, and dignified self-subordination to his theme. . . . We can afford to sacrifice a trivial vivacity for sake of a deeper spiritual interest. . . We can supply something from George Eliot's writings which sufficiently represents what is here missing; and we receive a gift of greater worth."—E. Dowden: Acad , xxvii. 89.

Cross, Mary Ann, ("George Eliot,") 1819-1880, b. at Arbury Farm, in the parish of Chilvers Coton, Warwickshire. Her father, Robert Evans, began life as a carpenter, but afterwards became a land-agent. He was twice married, his second wife, the mother of "George Eliot," being Christiana Pearson. In 1820 her father removed to Griff House, an old place, balf menor, bulf farm, where Mary Ann passed her child-hood, of which the early pages of The Mill on the Floss are in substance a reproduction. In her eighth or ninth year she was sent to a boarding-school at Nuneaton. Miss Lewis, the principal governess of the school, became her intimate friend, and corresponded with her for years, helping to influence her religious faith in the direction of Evangelicanism. In 1832 she was sent to a school at Coventry, where she remained till Christmas, 1835. In 1836 her mother died, and she took charge of her father's household, removing with him in 1841 of her father's household, removing with him in 1841 to Coventry, where she became very intimate with the family of Charles Bray, (q. v., supra.) His wife, Mrs. Caroline Bray, espra, was the sister of Charles Hennell, who had published, in 1838, an Inquiry concerning the Origin of Christianity, which was translated into German, with a preface by Strauss. The reading of this book, her intimacy with the Brays, and various other interpretable to an abandonment of her orthodox circumstances led to an abandonment of her orthodox views, which caused a temporary estrangement from her father. She thought of establishing herself as a teacher at Leamington, but soon returned to her father's house and resumed her old life. About this time she met Miss Brabant, who had undertaken a translation of Strauss's Life of Jesus, a task which, on her marriage, in 1843, to Charles Hennell, she handed over to Miss Evans. was accomplished under many discouragements, and the money for its publication obtained by a subscription started by Mr. Hennell. In 1849 Mr. Evans died. His daughter went abroad soon afterwards with the Brays, and remained for some months in Geneva, in the house of M. d'Albert, an artist, who became her friend, painted a portrait of her which is now in the library at Geneva, and afterwards published French translations of several of her novels. In 1850 she returned to England, and in 1851, having accepted the position offered her through Mr. Bray, of assistant editor of the Westminster Review she removed to London. Here she became interested in the writings of Comte and the positivist doctrines, by which she was influenced, though her adherence to them was never unqualified. She made the acquaintance of a number of notable men, including Herbert Spencer and George Henry Lewes, then editor of the Leader, whom she speaks of on her first introduction to him as "a sort of miniature Mirabeau in appearance," whom she distrusted a little at first, but soon pronounced "a man of heart and conscience wearing a mask of flippancy." In July, 1854, she entered into the connection with Lewes which she always regarded as a marriage, though without the legal sanction. They spent some time at Weimar, and then settled in Richmond, where they lived for three years. Urged by Lewes to try her hand at a novel, she began Amos Barton in 1856. It was sent without the writer's name to Blackwood, and with others in the series of Scenes of Clerical Life appeared anonymously in Blackwood's Magazine, the name George Eliot being adopted only on their re-publication in book form. Adam Bede followed, and made the pseudonyme famous. Her success as a writer relieved Lewes and herself from pecuniary anxieties, enabled him to devote his time to the prosecution of biological and philosophical studies, and brought a throng of friends and admirers to their Sunday receptions at the Priory, Regent's Park, where they lived from 1863 to 1876. After the death of Lewes, in 1878, she occupied herself for some time in preparing his unfinished writings for the press, and founded a studentship in memory of him. In April, 1880, she was married to J. W. Cross, supra, and Dec. 22 of the same year she died after a brief illness. Besides the works enumerated below, and some articles in the Westminster Review not included in the collection published since her death, she contributed two short stories—The Lifted Veil, and Brother Jacob—to Blackwood's Magazine in 1860, and Brother Jacob—to Blackwood's Magazine in 1860, and Agatha, a poem, to the Atlantic Monthly in 1869. 1. "It may contain firm assertion or stern satire, but it never sneers coldly nor asserts haughtily; and it always leads you to love or reverence something with your whole heart."—Sat. Rev., v. 566.

"The exquisite truth and delicacy both of the humour and the pathos of these stories I have never seen the like of... I have observed what seemed to me such womanly touches in these moving fictions that the assurance on the title-page is insufficient to satisfy me even now. "A novel of the highest class. Full of quiet power, without exaggention and without any strain after effect, it produces a deep impression on the reader, which remains long after the book is closed. . . 'Adam Bede' is a book to be accepted, not criticlsed."—Ath., No. 1635.

"The author has got into an original field of observation, and as he has very great powers of observing, and a happy method of making his detached points of observation into a connected whole, he gives us something we have not had before. He is evidently a country clergyman, and the object of his observation has been the rustic life of a village in one of the central counties,—a very unpromising object of observing to most men, but most men are not observers. . . The continuity of character is so well kept up. . . that it would be unfair to speak of the tale as a series of disconnected sketches; but the continuity is wholly in the characters, and the story, as a story, breaks down."—Sat. 5. The Mill on the Floss, Edin. and Lon., 1860, 3 vols. p. 8vo: 5th ed., 1862, p. 8vo.

"We do not consider 'The Mill on the Floss' equal to 'Adam Bede.' The authoress has not given herself fair play. There is the old freedom of hand, but the workmanship is neither so delicate nor so elaborate as in the 'Clerical Scenes' and 'Adam Bede;' neither is the story, as a story, at all comparable to 'Adam Bede' for interest, or for artistic treatment."—Ath., No. 1693.

"Now that we are wise after the event, we can detect many subtle signs of female authorship in 'Adam Bede' but at the time it was generally accepted as the work of a man. To speak the simple truth, without affectation of politeness, it was thought to be too good for a woman's story.... 'The Mill on the Floss' may not, perhaps, be so popular as 'Adam Bede,' but it shows no falling off nor any exhaustion of power.... If Mrs. Poyser remains unequalled, the great variety of characters, all distinct and yet all hitherto unanticipated, who figure in the first volume of the 'Mill on the Floss,' show that the range of the writer's observation goes far beyond one or two specimens.... Both in the description and in the dialogue there are exhibited a neaturess of finish, a comprehensiveness of detail, and a relish for subdued comedy that constantly bring back to our recollection the best productions of Miss Austen's genius.... Portraiture, however, and the description of George Eliot's thoughts. There is a side of her mind which is entirely unlike that of Miss Austen, and which brings her much closer to Charlotte Bronte. She is full of meditation on some of the most difficult problems of life. She occupies herself with the destinies. the possibilities, and the religious position of all the people of whom she cares to think.... But the objection which we feel to difficult moral problems being handled in fiction is certainly not removed by the writings of either of these gifted w

"The plot of 'Silas Marner' is good, and the delineation of character is excellent. But other writers who have the power of story-telling compose plots as interesting, and perhaps sketch characters as well. It is in the portradiure of the poor, and of what it is now fashionable to call 'the lower middle class,' that this writer is without a rival; and no phase of life could be harder to draw. . . The gift is so special, the difficulty is so great, the success is so complete, that the works of George Eliot come on us as a new revelution of what society in quiet English parishes really is and has been. . . Within its limits, 'silas Marner' is quite equal to either of its predecessors, and in combining the display of the author's characteristic excellences with freedom from blemishes and defects, is perhaps superior."

"As a serial story 'Romola' was not attractive; readers found their patience wearied by the minuteness with which they were required to follow the transitions of popular feeling in Florence. . . But, read as a consecutive whole, these scenes take their due place as the framework and background for the human characters, whose struggles and hopes and fears have a perennial interest, and which are in 'Romola' as vivid as if they concerned English men and women of 1863. . . The character of Savonarola is the gem of the book; it has been grasped and delineated with a wonderful force and truth that commends itself instinctively as a real presentment of the man. . . As a novel 'Romola' cannot be called entertaining: it requires sustained attention, and it is by no means light reading; but those who do not seek the mere amusement of an exciting story will find noble things in 'Romola,'—eloquent and beautiful pages,—subtle utterances and lofty thoughts. It has not the powerful interest that is to be found in the author's former novels: but there are indications of much higher powers of mind."—Ath. No, 1863.

"Great as is the power displayed in it, and varied as is the interest awakened in it, there is still the general impression produced by it that the authoress has been tempted into a field where, indeed, she is not less than she has been, but where her merits are obscured and their effect impaired. ... Sometimes the antiquarian quite drowns the novelist. ... The conception of the character of Savonarola which is here given is profound, subtle, and probably true. ... But there is little life in the scenes where he is introduced. He is merely a study, clever, original, and faithful. ... If she has got nothing else out of her Florentine researches, and out of her selection of an historical, remote, and uninteresting period, she has at least got the possibility of drawing such a character as Tito,—a Greek and an Italian at once, beautiful, refined, fexible, mean, cowardly, and yet charming and kind, and not very bad. In the latter part of the tale the subtle drawing of his character is swallowed up by the sad necessities of the Florentine story. .. But in the earlier part of the story his character is worked out with an infinite vividness and among much simpler elements. ... Romola, however, is the central character of the work which bears her name, and the interest attaching to her increases as the book goes on."—Sat. Rev., xvi. 124.

"As a story 'Felix Holt' is singularly inartistic.... As a novel with a hero there is no doubt that it is a failure..... It is as a broad picture of midland country life in England, thirty years ago, that 'Felix Holt' is, to our taste, most interesting. On this subject the author writes from a full mind, with a wealth of fancy, of suggestion of illustration, at the command of no other English writer, bearing you along on the broad and placid rises of her speech, with a kind of retarding persuasiveness which allows her conjured images to sink slowly into your very brain."—H. James, Jr.: Nation. iii. 127.

"The popular notion about the excellence and brilliancy of the style of George Eliot's novels is that it is simply the excellence of a painter like Teniers. People talk of 'Silas Marner' as if there were nothing in the excell hancy Lameter and the famous meeting in the parlour of the finn: of the 'Mill on the Floss' as if it were only a rural chronicle of Gleigs and Dodsons and Tullivers; of 'Adam Beie' as if it contained no more than a photographic reproduction of the life of midland dairies and farm-houses and appleorchards. No doubt the same kind of remarks will be made about the latest, and in some points the best, of the writer's stories. And there is no lack of material even for the limited appreciation involved in such criticism as life... One group succeeds another, and not a single figure appears in any of them, though it be ever so far in the background, which is not perfectly drawn and perfectly coloured."—Sat. Rev., xxi. 722.

10. Middlemarch: a Study of English Provincial Lite, Lon. and Edin., 1872, 4 vols. cr. 8vo. (Originally published in eight parts, December, 1871, to December, 1872.)

"If we are to call 'Middlemarch' a novel at all, we may say that as a didactic novel it has scarcely been equalled. Never before have so keen and varied an observation, so deep an insight into character and motives, so strong a grasp of conceptions, such power of picturesque description, worked together to represent through the agency of fiction an author's moral and social views. But the reservation we have implied is a broad one. No talent, not genius itself, can quite overcome the inherent defect of a conspicuous, constantly prominent lesson, or bridge over the disparity between the story-teller with an ulterior aim ever before his own eyes and the reader's, and the ideal story-teller whose primary impulse is a story to tell and human nature to portray,—not human nature as supporting a theory, but human nature as heses it... Not but that he must be hard to please who cannot, without overtaxing his powers of attention, derive plenty of amusement pure and simple out of 'Middlemarch,'—all that the ordinary novel-reader reads a novel for; but it would be unjust to so thoughtful, powerful, and earnest a writer to ignore the intention that underlies the whole. And to read such writing and thinking as they ought to be read is a real exercise of mind; especially as we own ourselves, while charmed by inimitable touches of character, and enjoying the author's graces of style and felicities of illustration and allusion, not seldom differing from her views and strictures upon society, and her suggestions for its amendment... But what a ceaselessly busy observation, what nicety of penetration, what a tenacity of memory, are indicated by these different social pictures! All the gradations of rank and class nicely measured and appreciated, even while the distinctions of rank are represented as provoking the low ambitton of common souls, and therefore things to be overstepped by natures of higher insight and more universal good will. In such questions the book is a deliberate challenge to society as at present constituted."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 733, 794.

challenge to society as at present constituted."—Sal. Rev., xxxiv. 7:33, 794.

"If it were necessary to fix upon any one quality as the characteristic trait of the book, few attentive critics would hesitate to name irony, taking a very extensive sense of the term, as its distinguishing feature. The avowed irony of much of the writing is too obvious to call for much notice. What is better worth observation is the indirect forms in which the same tendency shows itself. There is, for example, a constant irony of situation. Misfortunes befull men just at the moment when they feel the safest from them. . . . Exactly the same characteristic appears in the conversations of common people, auctioneers, horse-dealers, and landladies, in which George Eliot delights. They are no doubt amusing and truthful enough in themselves, but they derive a peculiar gusto from their prescuting an unconscious parody on the thoughts and language of educated people. But all the minor forms of irony sink to nothing compared with the lesson enforced by the conclusion of 'Middlemarch' itself . . . The conclusion of the whole matter is, that happiness depends on the adaptation of character to circumstances, and that, therefore, in a commonplace world, commonplace characters alone have a fair chance of happiness. . . . Though 'Middlemarch' has stuff' enough in it to fill out four or five ordinary novels, and though it would undoubtedly at once make the reputation of an unknown author, it will not be permanently placed on a level with 'Adam Bede,' Romola,' or with the most exquisite of all George Eliot's works, —the 'History of Silas Marner.' The defect of the book is, that the parts are more striking than the whole."—Nation, xvi. 60, 7h

"We recognize George Eliot's distinctive excellences all through, we never detect a flat or trivial mood of mind; if anything, the style is more weighty and pugnant than ever, we may even say loaded with thought. Nobody can resort to the time-honoured criticism that the work would have been better for more pains, for labour and care are conspicuous throughout, and labour and care which always produce suitable truit. But the fact is that the reader never—or so rarely as not to affect his general posture of mind—feels at home. The author is ever driving at something foreign to his habits of thought. The leading persons—those with whom her sympathies He—are guided by interests and motives with which he has never come in contact, and seem to his perception to belong to the stage once tersely described as peopled by such characters as were never seen, conversing in a language which was never heard, upon topics which will never arise in the commerce of mankind.'... GENERAL CRITICISM :

GENRIAL CRITICISM:

"Her whole work is imbued with ethical notions. The novel is, no less than the poem, a criticism of life; and the remarkable influence of George Eliot's novels has been mainly due to the consistent application of moral ideas to the problems set by each novel. Their stimulative effect was due to the fact that her ethical views were in consonance with some of the most advanced ideas of the age. The three chief principles which dominated her thinking were the reign of law in human affairs, the solidarity of society, and the constitution of society as incarnate history, (the phrase is Riehl's.) Flowing from these were the ethical laws which rule the world of her novels, the principle summed up in Novalis's words, 'Character is Fate,' the radiation of good and evil deeds throughout society, and the supreme claims of family or race. Add to these the extension of sympathy to all, and we have exhausted the idles mêres of George Eliot's system, which differentiates her novels from all others of the age."—All.., No. 2939.

the idées mères of George Eliot's system, which dinerentiates her novels from all others of the age."—All., No. 2939.

"There will be more perfect novels and truer systems. But she has little rivalry to apprehend until philosophy inspires finer novels, or novelists teach nobler lessons of duty to masses of men. If ever science or religion reigns alone over an undivided empire, the books of George Eliot might lose their central and unique importance; but, as the emblem of a generation distracted between the intensenced of believing and the difficulty of belief, they will live to the last syllable of recorded time. . . . In spite of all that is omitted, and of specific differences regarding the solemn questions of Conscience, Humility, and Death, there are few works in literature whose influence is so ennobling; and there were people divided from her in politics and religion by the widest chasm that exists on earth who felt at her death what was said of the Greek whom she had most deeply studled—oxfor elizate rebrye'ros."—Lord Acton: Nineteenth Century, March, 1885.

"Neither 'Felix Holt,' nor 'Adam Bede,' nor 'Romola,' is a masterplece. They have none of the inspiration, the traits, nor the essential simplicity of such a work. They belong to a kind of writing in which the English tongue has the good fortune to abound,—that clever, voluble, bright-colored novel of manners which began with the present century under the auspices of Miss Edgeworth and Miss Austen. George Eliot is stronger in degree than either of these, but she is not different in kind. She brings to her task a richer mind, but she uses it in much the same way. With a certain masculine comprehensiveness which they lack, she is eventually a feminine—a delightfully feminine—writer. She has the microscopic observation not a myriad of whose keen notations are worth a single one of those great synthetic guesses with which a real master attacks the truth, and which, by their occasional occurrence in the stories of Mr. Charles Reade. "Complete in all its parts, and strong in all, the nature of George Eliot is yet not one of those rare natures which without effort are harmonious. There is no impression made more decisively upon the readers of her books than this. No books bear more unmistakably the pain of moral conflict, and the pain of moral victory, only less biter than that of defeat. E. DOWDEN: Studies in Literature, 258.

"Certain that she belongs to the foremost intellectual forces of our time, and seeing that she is a novelist, (for neither poems nor essays express her genius truly,) some are apt to decide that she stands in the very front rank of the aritists of the modern world. That is surely to claim a great deal too much. Cervantes, Fielding, Scott, of course, stand immeasurably apart and above, by virtue of their wealth of imagination, their range of insight into manners, and sympathy with characters of every type. . . . The place of George Ellot will ultimately be found in the group where are set George Sand, Balzac, Junc Austen, Dickens, Thackeray, the Brontes. Judging her purely as an artist, we can hardly hope that her ultimate popularity will quite equal theirs. That she is immeasurably superior to them all as thinker, teacher, inspirer of thought and purifier of soul, will perhaps be little disputed. As facile creator of types, painter of varied character, veracious chronicler of manners, she has not their range, vivacity, irrepressible energy. . . . The inexhaustible charm of George Sand, the microscopic vivacity of Jane Austen, the pathetic oddities of Charles Dickens, the terrible Hogarthian pencil of Balzac and Thackeray, were all deliberately foregone by a novelist who read so deeply, who looked on lite so profoundly, and who meditated so conscientiously as George Eliot."—Frederic Harrison: Fortughtly Review, xilli. 316.

"There can be no doubt that George Eliot touched the highest point which, in a woman has been reached in our literature. . . . The remarkable thing about George Eliots genius is that though there is nothing at all unfeminine in it,—if we except a certain touch of scientific pedantry which is not pedantry in motire, but due only to a rather awkward manipulation of somewhat unfeminine learning. reflects not suitable to her genius. She grew up under Thackeray's spell, and it is clear that Thackeray's satirical vein had too much influence over her from first to last, but especially in some of those earlier takes into which she threw a greater power of passion than any which she had to spare for the two great efforts of her last ten years. . . . George Eliot had no command of Thackeray's literary stiletto, and her substitute for it is unwieldy. . . Imaginatively, we hardly recognize any defect in this great painter, except that there is too little movement in her stories; they wholly want dash, and sometimes want even a steady current. No novelist, however, in the whole series of English novelists, has combined so much power of painting external life on a broad canvas with so wonderful an insight into the life of the soul. . . We should rank George Eliot second only in her own proper field—which is not the field of satire—Thackeray's field—to Sir Walter Scott, and second to him only because her imagination, though it penetrates far deeper, had neither the same splendid vigour of movement nor the same bright serenity of tone."—Spectator, liv. 10.

"George Eliot is one of the few thinkers who can see the weakness of humanity, and the comparatively disappointing and mean nature of most objects of pursuit, without being driven by the violence of a common reaction into transcendental artifices. Nobody in her books is made to talk of rapture as a mood of happiness, or as the remedy for failure and the littleness of things. Practical resignation to the harshness and inflexibility of many of those conditions which are the material that a man has to make his life out of, and a sober, not costatic, resolution to seize such elements as remain, and force them into the pattern which we have chosen for ourselves,—this is a state of feeling and will which seems to count for a great deal more with her than any soluce which can come of beatific visions and discourse of eternal, unspeakable aspirations.

Like Mr. Carlyle, too, in this, as in a great many other points. George Eliot perceives that the only course for honest and worthy folk in the tangle which fools, with or without circumbendibuses, contrive to make of the world, is to stick to the work that the hand findeth to do."—J. MOBLEY: Macmillan's Magazine, xiv. 272. "George Eliot is one of the few thinkers who can see the

"The singular diligence with which the actual records of the artists' work have been sought out, or brought together from scattered printed sources, and then collated with their remaining pictures, has not slackened as the authors have advanced over their enormous field.... They have been rightly anxious to avoid the snares of word-painting and tinsel; they have much to record, and have thought more of noting it at once than of relating with literary skill; and hence, though we recognize their good taste, yet the book leaves much to be told when the genius of men like Mantegna or Bellini is in question. Cumming, Constance Frederica Gordon, b. 1837, at Altyre, Morayshire, Scotland, is a daughter of Sir William Gordon Cumming, Bart., of Altyre and Gordonstown, and sister of Roualeyn Gordon Cumming, (q. v., ante, vol. i.,) known as the Lion-Hunter of South On her mother's side she is descended from the Campbells, and from the celebrated beauty Elizabeth Gunning, Duchess of Argyle. A visit to a married sister living in the Himalayas was followed by twelve years of almost continuous travel. She is a diligent watercolor artist, has made sketches throughout her wanderings, and has contributed largely to periodicals. 1. From the Hebrides to the Himalayas: a Sketch of Eighteen Months' Wanderings in Western Isles and Eastern Highlands. Illust. Lon., 1876, 2 vols. 8vo.
"There is no conceivable reason why such distant regions should have been connected in these volumes, except that their names both begin with the letter H.... Miss Gordon Cunming has shown that she can use pen and pencil most effectively. . . . The sketches of Hebridean rocks, lakes, and castles are excellent, and the descriptions . . . are lively, faithful, and effective.—Sal. Rec.,

"With the wealth of materials placed at his command, and controlled by his own life-long experience. Mr. Curr is able to pass in review the bibliography of Australian ethnology, and in so doing brings a heavy indictment against some of its 'shining lights.' Many notions to which wide currency has been given by such accepted authorities as Brough Smyth, Taplin, Fison, McLellan, and Sir John Lubbock are shown to be absolutely erroneous."—A. H. Keane: Acad., xxxiv, 816.

"The task of the biographer is to examine the judgment his fellow-men have passed upon Mr. Buchanan, and review it in the light of the more complete evidence which he has at his command. This Mr. Curtis professes to have done, and finds that Buchanan has been misjudged. . . . His stand-point he has given us in a long chapter entitled a 'Summary of the Slavery Question'. This is, in substance, what was known in 1800 as the 'Silver Grey' Whilg position, and we do not find that Mr. Curtis has since accepted a more comprehensive view of the history of the country."—Nation, xxxvii. 277.

"The book shows thorough familiarity with the psychological researches of Professor Bain, G. H. Lewes, Mr. Herbert Speneer, and others, and contains many original and acute remarks upon the topic discussed. Its main purpose, however, is to indicate the defects of these writers purpose, however, is to indicate the defects of these writers in regard to higher philosophy, and to show the necessity of finding fuller satisfaction for the moral and religious aspirations. Unfortunately, it is defaced by the adoption of an elaborate system of new technical phrases."—LESLIE STEPHEN: Dect. of Nat.
